MADRAS HIGH COURT

* A. I. R. 1919 Madras 1
Full Bench

WALLIS, C. J., OLDFIELD AND SESHAGIRI AIYAR, JJ.

Muthuvelu Mudaliar—Plaintiff—Appellant.

Vythilinga Mudaliar — Defendant—Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 881 of 1917, Decided on 13th February 1919, against decree of Addl. Temporary Sub-Judge, Tanjore, in Appeal Suit No. 45 of 1917.

(a) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 58—Land sold absolutely but with right of repurchase to be exercised before certain date—Transaction is not necessarily mortgage by conditional sale.

Where in one and the same transaction land is sold absolutely but with a right of re-purchase to be exercised before a certain date, the transaction does not necessarily become, by virtue of S. 58, a mortgage by conditional sale, without reference to the intention of the parties: A. I. R. 1914 Mad. 37, Overruled. [P 5 C 1,2]

Per Wallis, C. J.—There is nothing in the definition contained in S. 58 (c) which favours the view that, wherever a sale-deed and an agreement to recovery form one transaction, it must necessarily be a mortgage and not a sale. [P 5 C 2]

Per Sheshagiri Aiyar, J.—To determine whether a particular transaction is a sale or a mortgage, the intention of the parties and the surrounding circumstances are the proper guides, and not the fact that the documents were of the same date or were expressed in any particular from. The Court cannot lay down any inflexible rule from the bare fact that the documents were of even date or were interdependent upon a single settlement. [P 6 C 1,2]

(b) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 58 (c)—Words "the mortgagor ostensibly selling the mortgaged property" imply mortgage in reality.

The words "the mortgagor ostensibly selling the mortgaged property" in S. 58 (c) imply that there must, in reality, be a mortgage and that the sale must be merely a cloak. [P 6 C 2]

(c) Deed — Construction — Party wishing document to be understood as being different from what words suggest—It must have shown that the form in which language is clothed does not express real intention of parties.

A party, who wishes a document to be understood as being different from what the words suggest, should show that the form in which the language is clothed does not express the real intention of the parties and that, in substance, the parties intended that there should be transaction different from what the language imports. In other words, there must be evidence to show that the parties intended a mortgage, although they used expressions which prima facie connote a sale [P 6 C 2, P 7 C 1]

S. Muthiah Mudaliar—for Appellant.

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar for B. Sitarama Row—for Respondent.

Order of Reference

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The transaction in question in this case was effected after the Transfer of Property Act came into force and the two documents making up the transaction not only came into existence on the same day but each refers to the other. There can be no question therefore in this case that they form the same and a single transaction: see Palaniappan v. Subbaraya Gounden (1) and Second Appeal No. 540 of 1916 where I have tried to collect the Indian cases bearing on the question, under what circumstances two documents formed a single transaction and when they must be deemed to indicate two separate transactions. In this case therefore we have not got the difficulties which arise from (a) the dates of the two documents being different or (b) from the second document reciting that out of pure grace and favour, etc.: see

(1) A. I. R. 1914 Mad. 37=22 I. C. 4.

Jhanda Singh v. Wahiduddin (2) the transferee of the first document agrees to reconvey, or (c) from the document or or documents being dated before Thumlusawmi Moodely v. Hossain Rowthen (3) or Pattabhiramier v. Vencatarow Naicken (4) or before the Transfer of Property Act came into force. In Palaniappan v. Subbaraya Gounden (1), where the execution of the two documents was divided by an interval of two days (the registration having been however on the same day) and where the second deed styled itself expressly as the counterpart of the first deed, I held that the two documents constituted a single transaction of mortgage by conditional sale. In Jhanda Singh v. Wahiduddin (5), Richards, J., says at pp. 599 and 600 of (I. L. R. 33 All.).

"It seems to me that if we held that at the time of the execution of the first deed the parties intended that the second deed also should be executed, we ought to hold that the two deeds constituted a mortgage by conditional sale and that the plaintiff has a right to redeem. On the other hand, if at the time of the execution of the sale deed, there was no intention of executing the second deed, the defendants are entitled to have the latter construed strictly and quite independent of the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act and the law of mortgages."

In that case the documents were of the years 1852 and 1853 respectively):

"There can in my opinion be no doubt that if the two deeds were of even date, an almost irresistible presumption would arise in favour of the transaction being a mortgage."

In that case no doubt on the particular facts (including the fact that the documents were separated by the interval of a year from each other) it was held that they did not costitute a single transaction of mortgage by conditional sale. As regards the contention that there must be the previous existence of the relation of creditor and debtor in order to constitute a transaction which is an ostensible sale (with a covenant for repurchase or covenant of rescission of the sale on repayment of a certain amount) a mortgage by conditional sale, I see no sufficient reason to change the view expressed in Palaniappan v. Subbaraya Gounden (1) that such considerations cannot be imported into India where we have got the plain words of S. 58, T. P. Act to guide us as to what the nature of a transaction is which should be a regarded as mortgage by conditional sale. Coming to S. 58, T. P. Act itself I need not say that I have given respectful and anxious consideration to the views of my learned brother (as reported in the case of Maruthai Goundan v. Dasappa Goundan (6) as also in the judgment to be just now pronounced by him as to the intention of the legislature in using the words "mortgagor," "mortgage money" and "mortgagee" in the definition of mortgage by conditional sale in Cl. (c), S. 58, T. P. Act. I regret that I am still of opinion that the legislature used those short words merely to avoid involved phraseology. No doubt, it would have been meticulously accurate if the language of the clause were as follows:

"Where the transferor in a transfer transaction ostensibly sells the property, the subject of transfer, on condition that on default of payment of the consideration money for the transfer on a certain date, the sale shall become absolute, etc."

A mortgage by conditional sale is ostensibly a sale

"Mortgages going under various names all over the country assume this from; in fact it is exceedingly doubtful if there are many genuine cases of sales with conditions of repurchase at all"

where the documents are of the same date or where there is only a single document of sale and agreement to reconvey. The legislature evidently knew this and, therefore in the Transfer of Property Act, they introduced the provision that such transactions must be prima facie regarded as mortgages and:

"as more likely to effectuate the intention of the parties than the rule to the contrary."

In Madhavrao Keshavrao v. Sahebrao Ganpatrao (7) the facts were exactly similar to those of the present case, there being a simultaneous execution of a sale-deed and an agreement to reconvey. Beaman, J., says at p. 123 (I. L. R. 39 Bom.):

"I have no doubt but that the contemporaneous documents of 1892 do constitute what is known in this country as a mortgage by conditional sale. Neither have I the least doubt that that was the intention of the parties executing them. Such mortgages are legislatively recognized and I have only to observe that in no true mortgage of this class will any debt be apparent. It is idle, therefore to criticise mortgages by conditional sale by reference to the essential conditions of a mortgage in the English sense of that word. It only needs to peruse the judgments of the Courts relating to these mortgages to observe how necessary it is to bear this in mind when the question is whether upon an interpretation of documents alone, the result is a mortgage by conditional sale or an out-and-out sale."

I am awere that in Narayan Ramkrishna v. Vigneshwar (8) a document of conveyance containing an agreement to reconvey was construed differently by Batchelor and Shah, JJ., through Batchelor, J., was a party to the case of Kasturchand Lakhmaji v. Jakhia Padia Patil (9) in which a sale-deed and a contemporaneous deed of agreement to reconvey were treated as a mortgage by conditional sale. Doubtless there were certain other circumstances relied on in Narayan Ramkrishna v. Vigneshwar (8) but, in my opinion, whenever there is a single transaction (whether contained in one or more documents) and where that transaction is an ostensible sale with a covenant to reconvey in case the consideration money for the transfer is repaid, it directly comes within the definition of mortgage by conditional sale in S. 58 (c), T. P. Act; and in such cases it is wholly unnecessary and even irrelevant to consider other circumstances for arriving at a decision on the legal nature of the transaction. [I might add that the case of Narayan Ramkrishna v. Vigneshwar (8) does not refer to the earlier decision in Madhavrao Keshavrao v. Sahebrao Ganpatrao (7).] In Second Appeal No. 540 of 1916, Phillips, J., and myself had to decide the question arising on the following facts:—There were two documents Exs. A and I, of the same date (27th October 1883), one being a sale-deed and the other an agreement by the vendee that he would enjoy the lands for a fixed period of 10 years and that after that period the vendor could get back the lands by repayment of the purchase-money before the commencement of the cultivation season in any year. We held that the two documents ought to be read together and that they were intended to be a mortgage by conditional sale. In that case the lower Courts had taken into consideration several facts, which happened both at the time and after the execution of the documents, in arriving at the intention of the parties and decided as a question of fact that the parties intended a mortgage by conditional sale.

(8) [1916] 40 Bom. 378=34 I. C. 414.
(9) A. I. R. 1915 Bom. 229=31 I. C. 388=40 Bom. 74.

Hence it was thought unnecessary to decide the neat and simple question whether solely on the definition of "mortgage by conditional sale" found in the Transfer of Property Act, the documents constituted in the eye of law a mortgage transaction. I therefore said at the end of my judgment in Second Appeal 540 of 1916:

"I do not wish to enter into the question whether particular forms of expression used in a document (or set of documents to be read together) necessarily imply and have the legal effect of creating a mortgage by conditional sale or of only creating an absolute right in the transferee with an obligation on his part to reconvey. On that question again there is a conflict of authority both in this Court and in the Bombay High Court and it is not absolutely necessary to decide that point for disposing of this second appeal;"

and then, I said that the question might have to be referred to a Full Bench when it directly arises.

As regards the decision in Second Appeal No. 2180 of 1915 there were indications in the documents themselves in that case that the agreement to re sell was merely an act of generosity on the vendee's part and that the option to repurchase was a personal favour granted to the vendor alone and was not intended to extend to strangers deriving title from him. In the result I agree in making the order of reference to a Full Bench as proposed by my learned borther.

Napier, J.—This second appeal raises the question whether certain documents constitute a mortgage by conditional sale or a sale with a right of re-purchase. The saledeed Ex. B was executed on 4th October 1883. The consideration recited is Rs. 455, which is arrived at by taking the amounts due on three hypothecation bonds of earliar dates amounting to Rs. 510 and a small amount of Rs. 20 due on a Small Cause Court decree making a total of Rs. 530. Of this amount Rs. 75 is to be received from a third party, leaving a balance of Rs. 455. The deed contains the usual words for an absolute sale, but it is to be subject to an agreement executed and given to the vendor on the same day. It continues:

"After the lapse of the term of three years mentioned in the agreement in respect of the lands of this sale deed, I shall get the miras entered in your name."

Ex. A, the agreement, is of the same date. It recites the purchase of the land and provides that:

"If you pay me in cash the sum of Rs. 455 in the Ani season of any year within the third year from this day, I shall receive and deliver possession of the said land to you on that date .... Besides I shall execute and give you a release deed in respect of that land on the stamp you will give me. If you delay to pay money and receive the sale deed and the release deed till after the date above mentioned this agreement shall stand cancelled."

It is contended before us that the sale and the re-purchase are obviously part of the same transaction, and I agree that this is so.

It is then contended that where the transaction is all one, it amounts to a mortgage, whatever was the intention of the parties ascertainable from evidence properly admissible. This is a proposition I am unable to accept. If the Transfer of Property Act makes such a document a mortgage, then certainly the intention of the parties is immaterial. I have discussed this point in the case reported as Maruthai Goundan v. Dasappa Goundan (6) and have there expressed the view, which had Bakewell, J.'s concurrence, that the legislature in S. 58, T. P. Act, did not intend to make transactions mortgages against the will of the parties, but only to provide that where the parties intended to make a mortgage the transaction was nonetheless a mortgage because it was put in the form of an outright sale and an agreement for repurchase. The opposite contention would necessarily go as far as this, that even if the agreement recited a refusal to grant a further loan the transaction would still be a mortgage. As I have pointed out, this view requires the substitution of the words—"transferor" for "mortgagor", "transferee" for "mortgagee" and "consideration" for "mortgage money" in Cl. (c), S. 58. I am aware that my learned brother takes a diametrically opposite view and that there is other authority to which he has referred which supports his contention, but with deference to his opinion, I do not think the language of the section supports this view. I quite agree that the Act in several places uses the word "vendor" in relation to contracts prior to sale. But I do not think that this affects the question. To my mind the word "mortgagor means a person intending to create a mortgage by the transaction just as "vendor" sometimes means a person who has made a contract intended to be followed by a sale. I know of no provision in the Code under which a person is called "vendor" who did not intend eventually to make a sale. If the object of the legislature had been to make such a drastic alteration in the existing law as to make documents inter partes operate both against their form and against the intention of the parties so that all such transactions become mortgages, it seems to me that it could have found words more apt for the purpose than these which we have here. And further, I can see no reason why we should attribute to the Legislature an intention to do something with regard to conditional mortgages which it is not doing to other forms of mortgages, namely, to create a mortgage against the will of the parties. S. 58 begins by defining a mortgage and says that (in the circumstances set out) the transferor is called a mortgagor and the transferee a mortgagee and the money of which payment is secured the mortgage money. It then proceeds to enumerate four forms which a mortgage can take, namely, simple mortgage, mortgage by conditional sale, usufructuary mortgage and English mortgage; and I do not think that it intended to do anything more then enumerate This is my view on the language of the section, but if it is permissible to go to the law prior to the Act, as I must assume that it is in view of the fact that Courts have differed on the construction of the Act, there can be little doubt what the law was. In a recent case decided by the Privy Council reported as Jhanda Singh v. Wahidudin (2), where the sale and agreement to re-purchase were prior to the Transfer of Property Act, there Lordships expressly state that it was not disputed that the test in such cases was the iutention of the parties to the instruments. But that intention must be gathered from the language of the documents themselves viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. Their Lordships refer with approval to the judgment of Lord Cranworth in Alderson v. White (10) which is as follows:

"That prima facie an absolute conveyance, containing nothing to show that the relation of debtor and creditor is to exist between the parties does not cease to be an actual conveyance and become a mortgage, merely because the vendor stipulates that he shall have a right to a repurchase."

(10) [1858] 2 De. G. & I. 97.

In the Manchester Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Company v. North Central Waggon Company (11) Lord Macnaghten says on page 568: "In all these cases the question is what was the real intention of the parties" and quotes with approval the decision in Alderson v. White (10). For the present I do not think it necessary to decide what the intention of the parties was, as I think we should get a ruling from the Full Bench on the broad question on which my learned brother and I differ. I would, therefore refer to a Full Bench the question whether, where in one and the same transaction land is sold absolutely but with a right of re-purchase to be exercised before a certain date, the transaction necessarily becomes by virtue of S. 58 T. P. Act, a mortgage by conditional sale, whatever the intention of the parties might have been.

Opinion

Wallis, C. J.—It is in my opinion, not open to us to answer the question referred to us in the affirmative consistently with the decisions of the Privy Council in Patabhiramier v. Venkatarow Naicken (4), Thumbuswami Moodelly v. Hossain Rowthen (3), Situl Purshad v. Luchmi Purshad (11) Bhogwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (12), Balkishen Dass v. W. F. Legge (13), and Jhanda Singh v. Wahid-ud-din (2). All these decisions lay down that in cases in India not governed by Bengal Regulation 16 of 1806 instruments of this kind are to take effect according to their tenor, unless it appears from the terms of the instrument or the surrounding circumstances, excluding oral evidence of intention as inadmissible, that the intention was to effect a mortgage. In Thumbuswami Moodelly v. Hossain Routhen (3), the Privy Council refused to disturb a decision of this Court which took a different view, because it considered that the parties might have been misled by a course of decision in this Court which their Lordships held to be erroneous, but they also indicated with sufficient clearness that there was no room for any such misconception in future.

In Balkishen Dass v. W. F. Legge (13) there were held to be sufficient indications that the transaction was intended to be a mortgage, and this decision was explained as proceeding on this ground in the subsequent decision in Jhanda Singh v. Wahid-ud-din (2). It is true that all these cases dealt with transactions before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, but I do not think that Act made any difference in the law on this subject in this part of India. In Balkishen Dass v. W. F. Legge (13), their Lordships observed that it might be assumed that the framers of the Transfer of Property Act intended in S. 58 to state the existing law and practice in India. The section begins with a definition of the terms "mortgage," "mortgagor" and "mortgagee" and proceeds, as pointed out by Napier, J., to describe or define the different sorts of mortgages which are met with in India. Sub-S. (c) deals with mortgages by conditional sale, in which the transaction is ostensibly a sale or transfer of ownership in exchange for a price, (S. 54,) but is really intended to be a mortgage or transfer of an interest in specific immovable property for the purpose of securing the payment of money S. 55 (a). As the transaction is really a mortgage and only ostensibly a sale, sub-S. (c) refers to the transferor as the mortgagor, and speaks of the ostensible sale of the mortgaged property subject to certain conditions as to the payment of the mortgage money. Whether a particular transaction is really a sale, or ostensibly a sale and really a mortgage must still be decided in accordance with the decisions of the Privy Council in the cases already cited. There is, in my opinion, nothing in the definition in S, 58 (c) which favours the view that wherever the sale-deed and the agreement to reconvey form one transaction, it must necessarily be a mortgage and not a sale. On the other hand, both in Situl Purshad v. Luchmi Purshad (11) and Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (12) there was clearly only one transaction, and it was nonetheless held by the Privy Council to be a sale and not a mortgage. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision in Palaniappa v. Subbaraya Goundan (1) should be overruled and the question answered in the negative.

Oldfield, J.—I agree.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—I entirely agree with the learned Chief Justice. But out of deference to the opinion of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., from whom we are differing, I wish to say a few words. In Pattabhiramier v. Venkatarao Naicken (4) the Judicial Committee laid down that a contract between the parties should be interpreted according to its tenor and that the practice of reading into it preconceived legal principles should be discouraged. All the subsequent judgments of the Privy Council seem to me to emphasise this cardinal principle. In Thumbuswami Mudali v. Hussin Rowthen (3) the Judicial Committee construed the document in that case as a mortgage because they held that the parties to that contract must be deemed to have contracted with reference to the wrong view of law enunciated by the Sudder Court at Madras before Pattabhiramier v. Venkatarao Naicken (4) was decided. They further said that the Legislature should intervene to correct the impression which the decisions of the Sudder Court had left in the minds of the litigant public. In Situl Purshad v. Luchmi Purshad (11), which related to a contract before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, although the documents were of the same date, the Privy Council held that the transaction was a sale and not a mortgage.

They stated that evidence can be looked into to ascertain the intention of the parties. In Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (12), where also the documents were of the same date, the transaction was construed as a sale. In Balkishen Das v. W. F. Legge (13) it was held that the transaction amounted to a mortgage. But it was pointed out that in the documents themselves there were "indications that the parties intended to effect a mortgage by conditional sale." It was further said that the Transfer of Property Act was framed in accordance with the existing law and practice regarding mortgages. The next case before the Board was Jhanda Singh v. Wahiduddin (5). Here again their Lordships held that the transaction was an out and out sale. Their Lordships said that the intention of the parties, which was the test in such cases, must be gathered from the language of the documents themselves viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. This is a distinct direction to Courts in India that in such matters the intention of the parties and the surrounding circumstances are the proper guide, and not the fact that the documents were of the same date or that they were expressed in any particular form. After this statement of the law it is not open to Courts in India to lay down any inflexible rule from the bare fact that the documents were of even date or were interdependent upon a single settlement. Mr. Muthiah Mudaliar referred in support of the view taken by Sadasiva Aiyar, J., to the use of the expression "one transaction" in p. 288 (of 43 I.A.) of this judgment. Their Lordships said:

> "If no such agreement was made before the deed of sale was executed and the latter deed was an afterthought, only suggesting itself after the sale deed had been executed and delivered it would not suffice. The execution of the deed of sale and of the contract of repurchase would then form two separate and independent transactions, not two connected and interdependent parts of one and the same "transaction."

I do not understand their Lordships to lay down that if there was a single settlement and two documents are connected and are interdependent, it must necessarily lead to the inference that there was a mortgage and not a sale. All that was said was that an essential requisite for construing such documents as a mortgage is that they should be dependent upon a single arrangement, and not that such a test is a conclusive criterion of the transaction being a mortgage. I do not propose to consider the decisions of the various High Courts In Madras, after Thumbuswami Moodelly v. Hossain Rowthen (3), there have been some cases which are not quite reconcilable with each other. But these cases do not help us much. It is in Palaniappan v. Subbaraya Gounden (1) that Sadasiva Aiyar, J., enunciated the proposition which has led to this reference. If I may say so with respect, the learned Judge does not attach sufficient importance to the language of S. 58, Cl. (c) T. P. Act. I agree with Napier, J., that the use of the word mortgage is not per incuriam. Cl. (c) speaks of a "mortgagor ostensibly selling the mortgaged property." That language implies that there must be in reality a mortgage and that the sale must be merely a cloak. A party who wishes the document to be understood as being different from what the words suggest should show that the form in which the language is clothed does not express the real intention of the parties and that in substance the parties intended that there should be a transaction different from what the language imports. In other words there must be evidence to show that the parties intended a mortgage although they used expressions which prima facie connote a sale. I am therefore of opinion that the question referred to us must be answered in the negative.

Opinion

Wallis, C. J.—I am of opinion on the construction of the section that the words "any offence referred to in S. 195" refer to offences within the scope of S. 195, and not to all offences against sections of the Indian Penal Code enumerated in S. 195 whether or not they are within the scope of that section. The preponderance of authority is in favour of this view, beginning with Abdul Khadar v. Meera Saheb (1). Parker and Shephard, JJ., gave no reasons for their decision in that case, but they were no doubt familiar with the history of the section, and knew that the words "committed before or brought under its notice in the course of a judicial proceeding" were first introduced into the section in the Code of 1882 as a further limitation on its operation, and that the corresponding sections of the Codes of 1861 and 1872 were clearly limited to cases coming within the operation of the sections corresponding to S. 195 of the present Code. In the Code of 1872, S 471 (now S. 476) was immediately preceded by Ss. 467, 468 and 469, which in 1882 were consolidated and transferred as S. 195 to an earlier part of the Code. S. 471 began thus:

"When any Court, Civil or Criminal, is of opinion that there is sufficient ground for inquiry into any charge mentioned in Ss, 467, 468 and 469, the Court, after making such preliminary inquiry, etc."

The marginal note "procedure in cases mentioned in Ss. 467, 468 and 469," meaning, of course, procedure in cases mentioned in those sections where such proceedings were taken by a Civil or Criminal Court, in my opinion, correctly represents the effect of the section. There appears to me to be no sufficient reason for holding that S. 471 of the Code of 1872 or the corresponding section of the Code of 1861 intended to give all Courts, Civil or Criminal, an unlimited power of originating prosecutions under all the sections of the Indian Penal Code mentioned in the sections referred to, or that the substitution of the words "any offence referred to in S. 195" for "any charge mentioned in Ss. 467, 468 and 469" had that effect. On the contrary the power conferred on the Court by S. 471 of the Code of 1872, even as restricted with reference to the preceding sections, was apparently considered too wide, and was further limited in 1882 by imposing the restriction that the offence must have been "committed before it or brought under its notice in the course of a judicial proceeding." The attention of the learned Judges who decided Akhil Chandra Sen v. Queen-Empress (2) and of the referring Judges in this case was not called to the fact that Ss. 195 and 476 of the present Code were not enacted for the first time in their present form, in which case they might have been expressed differently and other cases, such as the present, included or to the fact that the awkwardness or tautology to which they refer was the result of introducing a further limitation into the section by the words added in 1882. In some cases covered by S. 195, the new restriction was, no doubt, unnecessary, as pointed out by the referring Judges, but as a matter of drafting it was the easiest course to make the new restriction in general terms even at some risk of tautology. I may add that, where sections are repealed and re-enacted in a slightly different form, there is a presumption against implied, as contrasted with express, alterations in the scope of the section. I would answer the question in the affirmative.

Original Side Appeal No. 2 of 1917, Decided on 18th March 1918, from judgment and decree of Coutts-Trotter, J., D/- 14th November 1916.

(a) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 142—Receiver cannot claim to be in adverse enjoyment of properties put in his possession by Court as against parties to suit—Adverse possession.

A receiver appointed by a Court in a suit or proceeding cannot claim to be in adverse enjoyment of the properties put in his possession by the Court as against the parties to the suit, as the possession of the receiver is, in a sense, the possession of the Court and it is also the possession of all the parties to the suit according to their titles. [P 10 C 1, 2]

(b) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 142—Owner ceasing to issue bills for rents of properties does not constitute discontinuance of possession.

The fact that a person having title to a property ceases to issue bills for its rents will not amount to discontinuance of possession within the meaning of Art. 142. In order to constitute discontinuance of possession it would be necessary to show that some other person came into possession of the property. [P 10 C 1, 2]

(c) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 142—Distinction between dispossession and discontinuance of possession explained.

The difference between dispossession and discontinuance of possession is this: dispossession occurs where a person comes in and drives out the others from possession; discontinuance of possession occurs where the person in possession goes out and is followed into possession by other persons. [P 10 C 2]

(d) Hindu Law—Partition — Arbitrators appointed to effect partition effecting only partial partition; if accepted same is binding on parties.

Where members of a joint Hindu family appoint arbitrators to effect a partition of their family properties and the latter only effect a partial partition, the same, if accepted, will be binding on the parties. [P 9 C 1]

(e) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11—Arbitrators appointed to effect partition — Suit by one party to complete arbitration proceedings dismissed for default—Fresh suit for recovery of specific property allotted by award is not barred.

The dismissal for default of a suit brought by one of the parties to the reference to complete the arbitration and for a decree in terms of any award that may be passed by the arbitrators will not operate as res judicata in a subsequent suit for possession of the specific properties awarded under the partial partition [P 9 C 2]

Wallis, C. J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Coutts-Trotter, J., in a suit brought by the purchaser, from the Official Assignee, of the right, title and interest of the insolvent, one Rathnavelu Chetty (defendant 1, in the suit properties. The insolvent was adjudicated in October 1903 and in the course of 1904 there was some correspondence between the Official Assignee and the insolvent's brother Kuppuswamy Chetty, defendant 3 in this case. The then Official Assignee did not press his claim to the property but subsequently in 1910 his successor, Mr. Branson, took a different view and sold the property by public auction to the plaintiff. Now in the appeal which was argued before us the right of the plaintiff to stand in the shoes of the insolvent, Rathnavelu Chetty, by virtue of his purchase from the Official Assignee has not been contested. Three points were taken, two of which do not appear to have been pressed before the learned Judge.

The facts as regards this case are that in 1896 and 1897 two muchilikas, one, Ex. A, and the second, a more formal one Ex. B, were entered into by the members of defendant 1's family referring their disputes to an arbitration and empowering the arbitrators to divide all the properties among the members of the family. The arbitrators divided the immovable properties, allotting two shares to defendant 3, Kuppuswamy Chetty, and one share to each of the other brothers and reserving certain other properties for the maintenance of the female members; and all the members of the family in Ex. C signified their assent to this. The first objection raised by Mr. K. Srinivasa Ayyangar was that as the partition was never completed according to the muchilikas, this was not a final partition even of these items of immovable property. We think there is really no foundation for that contention, for, as was pointed out, it was been held frequently that the parties to an arbitration of this kind are quite at liberty, if they like, to accept a partial partition and that a partition is binding on them.

The next objection taken by Mr. K. Shrinivasa Ayyangar was that the suit was res judicata in defendant 3's favour. As I have said the full partition contemplated by the muchilikas was never carried out and defendant 1, who appears from the evidence to have been a man of unbalanced mind, a conclusion which is also supported by the interpretation of the learned vakil for the respondent in this case, was induced to question the partition and instituted a suit, Original Suit No, 30 of 1900, the plaint in which is Ex. E, really for a fresh partition. He was allowed to withdraw that suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit and he brought a fresh suit, Civil Suit No. 6 of 1901. If the plaint in that case be carefully examined it will be found that he did not sue, as the present plaintiff claiming under him sues, to recover these specific items of property. What he alleged against defendant 2 in that suit and defendant 3 in this was that that defendant denied his (the plaintiff's) right to a partition of the suit properties as joint family property (see para. 10). and not that he was denying the plaintiff's right to these specific properties which the present defendant 3 had specifically admitted in his written statement in the previous case; and what he asked for was a fresh partition. He also asked:

"Should this Honourable Court hold that there is still a legally subsisting reference, then effect may be given to the muchilika dated 8th January 1897 and one or more arbitrators appointed by this Honourable Court and a decree passed in terms of the award that may be made."

It really comes to this: that he asked for a fresh award by fresh arbitrators, but did not ask in that suit for the possession of these specific items of immovable properties. Therefore the subject-matter of the suit was not the same and it cannot be said that the question in this suit is res judicata as that suit was dismissed for default without leave to bring a fresh suit. That disposes of two of the objections urged by Mr. K. Srinivasa Ayyangar and leaves us to deal with the main question in the case. whether the suit was barred by limitation on the date when it was instituted.

For the purpose of deciding this question of limitation the learned Judge found upon the correspondence and the evidence that defendant 3 was not entitled to rely on his possession as adverse to the plaintiff before 22nd October 1904, the date of the letter Ex. T. Mr. C. P. Ramaswami Ayyar, who argued the case for the respondent, also relied upon the fact that defendant 3 was appointed receiver of the suit properties in the suit of 1900 and that therefore time never ran in his favour at all. I think that that argument is a sound one, and I propose to deal with it in the first place.

Now, if we examine the written statement in the suit of 1900, Exs. F and F 1, we find that the present defendant 3 whilst disputing the plaintiff's right to a partition as a member of the joint family did not dispute his right to the properties which had been awarded under the muchilikas. On the other hand he expressly alleged that the plaintiff was in possession of these properties. Para. 13 says that "the immovable property that fell to the share of each member was actually taken possession of by him and was separately enjoyed by him from that time forward," and para. 17 says that "the plaintiff had been himself issuing bills for the rent due from his properties and recovering the dues," though the rents had been collected through the family bill collector and had been deposited with defendant 3. Para. 25 says that

"the plaintiff has after January 1900 ceased to issue bills or draw money from this defendant with the sinster object of making it appear that there was no division or separate enjoyment."

In his evidence in this case the present defendant 3 said that his brother

Rathnavelu Chetty had never done anything else to disclaim his possession. The mere fact that he ceased to issue was not sufficient to put him out of possession. In the same written statement we have this heading in the schedule:

"Immoveable properties that fell to the share and are in the possession of M. Rathnavelu Chetty (the plaintiff)."

In the affidavit for the appointment of a receiver which was put in that suit (Ex. A) the present defendant 3 says:

"I crave leave that my written statement may be treated as part and parcel of this my affidavit," and thereby reiterates the statement that the properties were in the possession of the insolvent. And in para 7 he says that:

"the allegation in para. 8 of the plaintiff's affidavit is, to say the least, incorrect for, as I have stated in my written statement, I am not in possession of all the family properties but the plaintiff and defendant 3 and others are also in possession of the family properties and enjoy the rents and profits. The plaintiff herein, who has been receiving the rents and profits from his share of the family properties, has deliberately not received them from February this year with the object of making it appear that there was no division."

In the face of these statements of the present defendant 3 in his written statement, and in his affidavit coupled with his oral evidence, it is absolutely impossible, in my opinion, to hold that he was in possession adversely to the insolvent at the date of the suit or at the date when he was appointed receiver. If he was in possession at all at the time he was appointed receiver his possession was that of his brother, the present insolvent. The possession of the receiver in one sense is said to be the possession of the Court, but as observed in Kerr on Receivers, the possession of the receiver is the possession of all the parties to the suit according to their titles. Now, it is not contested thst, at the time the receiver was appointed, the person who was entitled to the suit properties was the insolvent, and further, as I have already held, he was in possession when the receiver was appointed. The possession of the Court through the receiver was therefore the possession of the insolvent. The receiver defendant 3 in this case, has never yet been discharged; and even if he had been discharged, that would make no difference. He would still hold the property on behalf of the rightful owner, as observed in the Note in Kerr on Receivers, at p. 151,* Edn. 4, citing Horlock v. Smith (1). The contention that defendant 3, who got himself appointed receiver on the footing that the suit property was in the rightful possession and ownership of the insolvent, could afterwards, during the receivership, turn round and set up an adverse title is, in my opinion, absolutely untenable and really obnoxious to the forcible observations contained in the judgment of Lord Macnaghten in Corea v. Appuhamy (2). This ground is quite sufficient to dispose of the suit. But we also agree with the conclusion at which the learned Judge has arrived upon the correspondence that, assuming Art. 142, Lim. Act, to be applicable, the insolvent was not dispossessed nor did he discontinue to be in possession within 12 years of the institution of the suit. What amounts to discontinuance of possession is explained by Fry, J., in Rains v. Buxton (3):

"In my view the difference between dispossession and the discontinuance of possession might be expressed in this way: the one is where a person comes in and drives out the others from possession; the other case is where the person in possession goes out and is followed into possession by other persons."

As I have already pointed out, with reference to this case there is no satisfactory evidence that the insolvent ever went out of possession. All that is shown is, and what is stated in his written statement and in his affidavit is, that during the receivership defendant 3 was in possession. Assuming that by ceasing to issue bills the insolvent went out—defendant 3 admits that he did nothing else—assuming that this amounts to going out of possession, to make it discontinuance of possession it would be necessary to show that defendant 3 came into possession. On the evidence I agree with the learned Judge that he never purported to take possession of the property until the date of the letter Ex. T. We have seen in the written statement in the first suit and in the affidavit for the appointment of a receiver that he stated that the insolvent was in possession, which apparently was the truth. In the written statement in the second suit, which is Ex. K, while he set up that all the properties were the self-acquisitions of himself and his father, he did not deny that the insolvent had acquired a title to the items that are now sued for by virtue of the muchilikas. In para. 18 he merely said that the plaintiff was not entitled to insist on the completion of the arbitration. On the contrary, in para. 11 there is the allegation that "the plaintiff," i. e., the insolvent, "himself took possession of the properties that fell to his share."

The next thing was the insolvency of the present defendant 1 in October 1913. Following what is unfortunately not at all an uncommon practice with insolvents, he returned his immovable property as nil in his schedule with a view to prevent his creditors from getting at it. The matter however engaged the attention of Mr. Read, who recently had succeeded to the office of the Official Assignee, in the latter part of 1914 and he wrote Ex. O to the present defendant 3, Kuppuswamy Chetty, asking for an inspection of the award and received the answer Ex. P, in which defendant 3 told him that he had not got the award with him, but referred to the fact that the properties were then divided. Then in Ex. Q the Official Assignee wrote—and this is important for the understanding of the answer:

"I understand that the immovable properties of the family were divided in 1897: that, since then, the following properties have been in the separate enjoyment of the insolvent."

and he proceeded to set out the properties in suit now. There is no denial either of the properties having fallen to the insolvent's share or of their being in his enjoyment. In the answer Ex. R, which defendant 3 wrote on 12th October 1904, he merely says that the title-deeds are in his possession and that

"not a single title-deed of the said properties stands in the name of the insolvent. As regards the collections of rents, dues, etc., of such of the properties that yield income they are being collected by me under the circumstances mentioned in para. 17 and 25 of my written statements filed in Civil Suit No. 30 of 1900 and under the receivership in the above suit on 19th July 1900 as also to the facts stated in para. 15 of the written statement filed by me in Civil Suit No. 6 of 1901."

As I have already stated, in my opinion, having regard to the fact that he got possession under the receivership, what he now said was of absolutely no consequence. Further he acknowledges that he was in possession under the receivership and a reference to para, 17. of his written statement in the first statement does not show that he claimed in any way at that time to be in possession on his own behalf. Similarly with regard to para. 25. As I have already pointed out, para. 25 does not amount to an allegation even of discontinuance of possession on the part of the insolvent, and then para. 15 of the written statement in the second suit merely says;

"plaintiff having thus put an end to the arbitration is not entitled to ask for the completion of it."

But he in no way questioned the insolvent's title to or his possession of the properties now in suit. It was not until the Official Assignee wrote Ex. S asking for the delivery of the properties that defendant 3 purported, in his letter dated 22nd October 1904, to set up an adverse claim and claimed to be in possession on his own account. I have already said that a receiver is not competent to take up such an attitude and even if he was competent to do so, this suit was filed within 12 years of that time and so I agree with the learned Judge that up to that time his possession must be held to be on behalf of the insolvent. The conclusion is supported by a good deal of oral evidence in the case. The insolvent's own evidence is that for a long time defendant 3 was supporting him by grants of Rs. 30 or 40 a month, and there are some receipts which were taken by defendant 3 in respect of these properties and in which the insolvent's name is entered: and there must have been other receipts taken during this time which defendant 3 has not produced and which, if produced, would probably show that he was in possession on behalf of the insolvent. At first he was no doubt merely assisting his brother in the endeavour to defeat the Official Assignee and his creditors and to keep the properties out of their reach. At a later stage he appears to have conceived the design of claiming to have held the property on his own account and has raised that plea in the present suit. For the reasons I have already given that plea has entirely failed and I agree in the conclusions of the learned Judge and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Spencer, J.—I entirely agree.

Wallis, C.J.—This is a Letters Patent appeal from the decision of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., who held, (Bakewell, J., dissenting) that the Court has power to relieve against a provision in a mulgeni or permanent lease, a form of agricultural lease in use in South Kanara, for re-entry by the landlord on breach of a covenant or condition against any alienation by the lessee of his mulgeni right except in the manner therein provided. The lease, which is inartistically drawn, provides in substance that, if the lessee or his representatives have to sell or mortgage their mulgeni right, they are first to give a written notice to the lessor or his heirs, and, if they fail to act on it or to reply thereto, the lessor is to be free to make the alienation but that alienations in contravention of these provisions are to be void, and the lessor is to be at liberty to re-enter and enjoy the land inclusive of improvements. This we read as meaning that the lessee is to give notice to the lessor of the terms of any transaction which he proposes to effect by way of sale or mortgage of his mulgeni right, and that the lessor is then entitled to become himself the purchaser or mortgagee on those terms, and as in fact conferring a right of pre-emption.

Two questions arise in the case, whether the Court has any general jurisdiction to relieve in a case of this kind, and if not, whether such jurisdiction has been conferred upon it by the amendment to S. 74, Contract Act. As regards the first question, it is well settled that a Court of equity could not relieve against a right of re-entry or forfeiture under any provision or stipulation in a lease for a breach of any covenant in the lease except the covenant for payment of rent. The history of this question is most lucidly explained by Kay, L. J., in Barrow v. Isaacs (1):

"Court of equity" he says: "assumed jurisdiction to relieve against forfeitures and penalties where the only object was to secure payment of a definite sum of money even though there was no fraud, accident, surprise or mistake. On this principle it relieved against payment of the whole penalty on a money bond before the Statutes 4 and 5 Anne, Ch. 16, Ss. 12 and 13 and 8 and 9, Wm. 3, C. 11, which enabled the Courts of Law to give the same relief. Also against forfeiture for non-payment of rent; and by Statute 4, Geo. 2, Ch. 28, its powers in this respect were somewhat restricted by limiting the time for their exercise to six months after execution in ejectment At first there seems to have been some hesitation whether this relief might not be extended to other cases of forfeiture for breach of covenants such as to repair, to insure, and the like where compensation could be made, but it was soon recognized that there would be great difficulty in estimating the proper amount of compensation and since the decision of Lord Eldon in Hill v. Barclay (2) it has always been held that equity would not relieve, merely on the ground that it could give compensation, upon breach of of any covenant in a lease except the covenant for payment of rent But, of course this left unaffected the undoubted jnrisdiction to relieve

(1) [1891] 1 Q. B. 417.
(2) [1811] 18 Ves. (Jun.) 56.

in the case of breach occasioned by fraud, accident surprise or mistake. "

The law, as here laid down, has been reproduced in the Transfer of Property Act, which provides expressly in S. 111 that a lease in immovable property determines

" (g) by forfeiture ; that is to say (1) in case the lessee breaks an express condition which provides that, on breach thereof the lessor may re-enter, or the lease shall become void ; " and only gives power to relieve against such determination by forfeiture for non-payment of rent (S. 114). It is noteworthy that the Indian Legislature preferred to adhere to the old law in this respect and did not adopt the provisions of S. 14, Conveyancing Act of 1881, which was followed in several other sections. S. 14 of that Act imposes restrictions on, and confers powers of relief against, forfeitures of leases generally and not merely as regards forfeitures for non-payment of rent, but leaves the law as it was before with regard to cases such as the present, because it provides in sub-S. (6) that the section does not extend to a covenant or condition against the assigning, underletting, parting with the possession or disposing of the land leased or to a condition for forfeiture on the bankruptcy of the lessee, or on the taking in execution of the lessee's interest. This section gives the English Courts power to relieve against stipulations which were not regarded by Courts of equity as stipulations by way of penalty because they were not intended to secure the repayment of money ; but it did not interefere with provisions such as the present, designed to prevent transfer of the land to third parties against the landlord's will. As observed by Lord Eldon in Hill v. Barclay (2) as regards a covenant of this kind :

" It is sufficient that the lessor insists upon his covenant ; and no one has a right to put him in a different situation, "

a view to which the legislature has adhered in sub-S. 6, S. 14, Conveyancing Act. Such a covenant in my opinion, cannot properly be regarded as a stipulation by way of penalty, and it is therefore unnecessary to decide whether provisions in leases for re-entry for breaches of other covenants in the lease can be regarded as coming within S. 74, Contract Act, as amended. S. 74 in its present form provides that " when a contract has been broken, if a sum is named in the contract as the amount to be paid in case of such breach, or if the contract contains any other stipulation by way of penalty, the party complaining of the breach is entitled, whether or not actual damage or loss is proved, to have been caused thereby, to receive from the party who has broken the contract reasonable compensation not exceeding the amount so named or, as the case may be, the penalty stipulated for. "

This amendment and the decisions which give rise to it, have been very fully discussed in Natesa Iyer v. Appavu Padayachi (3), where it is pointed out that the word " penalty " was first inserted in the Contract Act in 1899 by this amendment and is not defined in the Act. Equity, as we have seen, only considered stipulations in contracts penal which were intended to secure the payment of money, and it may be questioned whether the term has a more extended meaning in this section, which was designed to abolish, so far as India is concerned, the distinction between stipulations for liquidated damages and stipulations for pecuniary payments by way of penalty and which speaks of the party complaining of the breach receiving reasonable compensation not exceeding the amount named or the penalty stipulated for, and whether it can be construed as affecting the express provisions of S. 111, T. P. Act which makes leases determinable by virtue of provisions for re-entry on breach of covenant.

The fact that agricultural leases such as this one are excepted from the operation of Ss. 105 to 116, T. P. Act does not, in my opinion affect the present question. The Act was framed by eminent English lawyers to reproduce the rules of English law in so far as they are of general application and rest on principle as well as authority, and its provisions are in my opinion binding on us as rules of justice, equi y and good conscience, when we have to deal with agricultural leases in the absence of any special reason for not applying them. The legislature wisely in my opinion if I may say so, has refrained from making these sections applicable proprio vigore to agricultural leases for fear of unnecessarily interfering with settled usages which it is undesirable to disturb. But in the absence of special reasons, there is no ground for applying a different rule in the cases of agricultural leases and there are many decisions to that effect.

(3) [1909] 33 Mad. 375=3 I. C. 941.

For these reasons I would allow the appeal and modify the decree of the District Judge by giving the plaintiff possession in addition to the reliefs already granted with costs throughout. Four months for removal of superstructure, etc.

Napier, J.—I agree with the learned Chief Justice that S. 74, Contract Act, does not apply to the terms of the contract in this case. I cannot agree with Sadasiva Aiyar, J., that we can apply the principle on which the amendment to that section is based, as I think that we should be very careful in applying statutory provisions that are not in pari materia. For the same reason I would not seek the assistance of the Transfer of Property Act as a guide when we are applying equitable reliefs, especially as in this case we are dealing with material that has been excluded from the purview of the Act by express words: vide S. 117. The provisions as to forfeiture in the Transfer of Property Act do not coincide with those enacted in the Conveyancing Act, which does not apply to agricultural leases. There is however no statutory bar to our seeking guidance from English law and I entirely agree with the learned Chief Justice that Courts of Equity would not grant relief in the present case. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Kumaraswami Sastri, J.—I agree with the judgment of my Lord and I have nothing to add.

Civil P. C. (1908), Ss. 115 and 151—Dismissal of appeal without notice to appellant is irregularity—High Court can exercise inherent powers and also powers of revision.

Where a Court dismisses an appeal, of the hearing of which the appellant has no notice whatever, the Court, though in ignorance of the true facts, must be held to have acted with material irregularity and in such a way as to induce a miscarriage of justice, and the High Court would be justified in using not only its inherent powers referred to in S. 151, but also its powers under S. 115, to set aside the order of dismissal. Ayling, J.—The circumstances of the case out of which these petitions arise are somewhat extraordinary, and as the course we propose to take is one which we should be sorry to see misquoted as a precedent, I deem it best to set them out in detail. The appellants in Appeal Against Order No. 228 of 1917 and petitioners in Civil Revision Petition No. 553 of 1917 (whom we shall henceforward refer to as appellants) were appellants in Appeal Suit No. 11 of 1903 on the file of the Subordinate Judge of Masulipatam. They succeeded, the decree of the original Court being reversed. The other side preferred a second appeal to this Court (Second Appeal No. 1983 of 1913). This Court set aside the decree of the Sub-Court and remanded the appeal to the Subordinate Judge of Masulipatam for disposal according to law. This was on 5th January 1916. Meantime certain changes had taken place in the Courts of the Kistna District. The Sub-Court of Masulipatam, which had disposed of this appeal, was directed to hold its sittings at Bezwada and its designation altered to the Sub-Court of Bezwada. A new Court has been constituted under the title of the Temporary Sub-Court of Masulipatam and was working at Masulipatam when the order of this Court in second appeal was passed.

It is beyond dispute that the effect of this Court's order was to direct restoration of the appeal to the file of the Court sitting at Bezwada which was identical with the Court which originally heard it, although its designation and place of sitting had been altered. The parties however fell into the not unnatural error of thinking that the appeal would be heard by the Court of Masulipatam. As far as appellants are concerned, this error is testified to in the affidavits filed which have been accepted by the lower appellate Court, and which we accept as true in this respect. How natural the error was may be gauged by the fact that it was shared by the office of this Court which sent the records in the first instance to the Temporary Sub-Court of Masulipatam. The latter Court transmitted them to the Bezwada Court. The Bezwada Court, on receipt of the records, posted the appeal for having on 6th March 1916. No notice was sent to the parties, but under R. 16, Civil Rules of Practice, notice of the hearing was affixed on the Court notice board. On 6th March 1916 neither party appeared. The Court took time till 14th March 1916; and then dismissed the appeal for default of appellants' appearance under O. 41, R. 17 (1).

The lower appellate Court says:

"There can be no doubt that neither party knew anything about the appeal having been sent to this Court for disposal."

In this I entirely agree, though it is only the appellants whose ignorance is material. On 28th November 1916 the appellants, having somehow come to know of this order of dismissal, filed a petition to set it aside. The petition was put in under O. 47, R. 1, as a review petition since a petition under O. 41, R. 19, would have been time barred. There is no reason to suppose that the appellants were guilty of undue delay in preferring this application after they came to know of what had happened. At the time this petition was filed, Mr. Jivaji Rao, the Sub-Judge who dismissed the appeal for default, was still in charge of the Court. He however passed no orders upon it up to the time of his departure on transfer in the following month. The petition therefore came for disposal before his successor, Mr. Raghava Ayyangar. The latter, while finding the facts above set forth in appellants' favour, felt himself constrained to dismiss the petition on the ground that under O. 47, R. 2, he had no power to review his predecessor's order, the latter not having directed notice to issue to the other side. It is against this order of Mr. Raghava Ayyangar that appellants invoke our aid both in appeal and revision; and Mr. Ramadoss, who appears for respondents to oppose them, does so on the ground that, however inequitably things may have worked out, the order of Mr. Raghava Ayyangar is absolutely correct from a legal point of view and that we have no power to interfere.

It is unnecessary to discuss this because, in my opinion, the error goes further back, and has resulted in such a flagrant denial of justice that we are not only justified, but called upon to use the inherent powers referred to in S. 151, Civil P. C. The result of the orders passed subsequent to the remand of the appeal by this Court has been that appellants, though for no fault of their own, have been practically deprived of the right of appeal which they possessed. Their appeal has been dismissed without their having any opportunity of arguing it. The affixing of notice of hearing on the board of the Bezwada Court might be sufficient notice where the parties were aware of the pendency of the appeal in that Court, and might be expected to watch the board either by themselves or by their pleaders. It could not be in the present case, where, through a natural error (as shown above), they expected the appeal to be heard in another Court, 50 miles away. It is impossible to conceive that, in these circumstances, Mr. Jivaji Rao would have declined to re-admit the appeal, if the true facts had been brought to his notice in time by a petition under O. 41, R 19. That this was not done was also due simply to appellants' ignorance of what was going on. The same officer's failure to pass orders on the review petition before his departure may be explicable on the ground of pressure of work, or inadvertence, but is much to be regretted. In my opinion the case comes within the spirit of the remarks of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Debi Bakhsh Singh v. Habib Shah (1). In dismissing an appeal, of the hearing of which the appellants had no notice whatever the Sub-Court, though in ignorance of the true facts, must be held to have acted with material irregularity and in such a way as to induce miscarriage of justice; and, under Ss. 115 and 151, Civil P. C., I would set aside the order of dismissal and direct the Sub-Judge of Bezwada to restore Appeal No. 11 of 1913 to his file and to dispose of it according to law. Costs in these proceedings should be costs in the cause.

Krishnan, J.—The Subordinate Judge is clearly right in holding that the appellants' application, viewed as one under O. 41, R. 19, Civil P. C., is barred by limitation under Art. 168, and as one for review of judgment, it could not be granted by him as notice had not been ordered by the Judge who originally passed the order of dismissal. But I agree with my learned brother that in the special circumstances of this case described by him the Subordinate Judge should have acted under S. 151, Civil P. C., and used his inherent powers to set aside the order. There can be no doubt that, if the order is allowed to stand, the appellants' right of appeal in the main suit will be taken away from them for no default committed by them. It was therefore clearly necessary for the ends of justice and to prevent abuse of process of Court to set it aside. I agree with my learned brother that the principle of the decision of the Privy Council in Debi Bakhsh Singh v. Habib Shah (1) applies to this case, though the facts of that case were somewhat different.

It was contended that S. 151 could not be used for extending periods of limitation and overruling legislative provisions, and reliance was placed on the observations in Vannisami Thevar v. Periyaswami Thevar (2) and Kanai Lal Ghose v. Jatindra Nath Chandra (3). That, of course, is so; for no inherent power will exist against an express provision of law. But in this case there does not seem to be any such provision against applying S. 151. O. 41, Rr. 17 and 19, Civil P.C., do not properly apply to a case like the present, where the Court in which the appeal was to be heard was changed without the parties being informed or knowing anything about it. Though the appellants could have applied under R. 19 if they had known of the dismissal in time, they were not bound to do so and it cannot be said that that was their only remedy. As for the review filed by them, it is doubtful if that was a proper remedy at all. If it was, the appellants did apply and their failure to get relief was not due to their fault at all. But they were clearly not bound to apply for review. It cannot therefore be said that there was any rule of law requiring the appellants to adopt any particular procedure such as that under R. 19 or that by way of review. I think that it was open to them to ask the Court to use its inherent powers and that, I think, was their proper remedy in the circumstances. That being so it is open to us under S. 115, Civil P. C., to revise the order of the Sub-Judge, as he failed to exercise the jurisdiction vested in him under S. 151, Civil P. C., as he might have done. I agree to the order proposed by my learned brother.

Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), S. 2—Legal representative—Decree against person in possession of estate of deceased—Execution proceedings bind real heir.

Where a creditor in good faith obtains a decree against a person in possession of his debtor's property whom he believes to be, but who is not in fact, the legal heir of the debtor, execution proceedings taken in pursuance of that decree will bind the real heir: 31 I. C. 920, Expl.

Such a case must however be treated as an exception to the general rule that proceedings in execution of a decree do not bind the interest of any person who is not brought on the record as a party to the proceedings in the suit.

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar—for Appellants.

P. Narayanamurthi and M. Patanjali Sastri—for Respondents.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—Defendants 3 and 4 are the appellants in this second appeal. Defendant 4 is the purchaser in Court auction sale of the plaint property which belonged to the plaintiff's father, who died before 1913. The decree in execution of which the sale took place, was a small cause decree passed in a suit of 1913 brought against the plaintiff's father's brother as defendant 2 he being impleaded as the legal representative of the plaintiff's father Seethayya, who was then dead. Defendant 2 was divided from plaintiff's father and he was not the real legal representative of plaintiff's father, the minor plaintiff being such representative. The question is whether the Court auction sale is binding on the plaintiff.

In para. 6 of the plaint it is alleged that defendant 2 was not only not the heir of the plaintiff's father, but that the plaint property was never in the possession of defendant 2 after the plain-tiff's father's death. These allegations in the plaint were not expressly denied in the appellant's written statements. The learned vakil for the appellants relied, among other decisions, on the decision of Napier, J., and myself in Gnanambal Ammal v. Veerasami Chetty (1). There a decree had been passed against a person in possession of the property of the deceased debtor, though that person was not the heir of the debtor. We held that if the plaintiff in good faith obtained a decree against a person who was in possession of his debtor's property and whom the plaintiff believed to be the legal heir, execution proceedings taken in pursuance of that decree will bind the real heir.

We held that the cases in General Manager of the Raj Durbhanga v. Maharajah Coomar Ramaput Singh (2) and Ramasawmi Chettiar v. Oppilamani Chetti (3) supported our view as also the new definition of "legal representative" found in S. 2, Cl. 11, Civil P. C. (5 of 1908). I might also refer to Bissessur Lall Sahoo v. Luchmessur Singh (4) and Ishan Chunder Mitter v. Buksh Ali Soudagur (5). The case of a decree passed in a suit brought against a person in possession but who is not the heir of the deceased debtor's estate, must of course be treated as an exception to the general rule that proceedings in execution of a decree do not bind the interest of any person who was never brought on the record as a party to the proceedings in the suit: see Kishen Chunder Ghose v. Mt. Ashoorun (6) as regards the general rule. The decisions dealing with suits which had been instituted against a debtor before his death but were continued after his death till decree or after the decree in execution proceedings with the wrong person on record as legal representative are irrelevant for the consideration of the plaint before us, as pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Khairajmal v. Daim (7). In the present case defendants 3 and 4 contested the plaintiff's claim, not on the ground that defendant 2 was in possession of the plaint property and hence might be taken as the plaintiff's father's legal representative in some sense but on the ground that the decree was passed for a debt of the plaintiff's father and hence is binding on the plaintiff, the question who was sued as plaintiff's father's legal representative or against whom the decree was obtained as such being immaterial according to the contention put forward by the appellants. I think such a contention cannot be supported, having regard to the decision in Khairajmal v. Daim (7) see also Madhayarayudu v. Subbamma (8).

I would therefore dismiss the second appeal with plaintiff's costs.

Second Appeal No. 1813 of 1917, Decided on 25th October 1918, against decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Cocanada, in Appeal Suit No. 27 of 1917.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 41, R. 27—Admission of fresh evidence—Admissibility of, in second appeal—Sufficient cause depends on particular case.

There is no objection on grounds of principle or convenience to the admission in second appeal of a document such as the judgment of a High Court, which could not be produced earlier because it was not in existence, and which requires no further evidence to explain it. No general rule however can be laid down and each case must be dealt with with reference to its own merits, and the existence of the sufficient cause referred to in O. 41, R. 27. [P 18 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11—Doctrine of res judicata applies equally to second appeal.

Section 11 is not confined in its application to suits and first appeals. Its provisions apply equally to a second appeal the hearing of which is a trial within the meaning of that section. [P 18 C 2]

Judgment.—The plaintiff, here appellant, sued in ejectment alleging that defendants 1 and 2 had attorned to him as tenants by paying him rent for one year, defendant 3 being their subtenant, and that they had subsequently set up the title of defendant 4. Plaintiff set up his own title as by purchase from Sattemma, who claimed under the will of Rajasekharadu. Defendants denied the title of both the last mentioned and contended that the decisions in Original Suits Nos. 212 of 1905 and 133 of 1915 were res judicata in their favour. The District Munsif accepted this contention. The lower appellate Court confirmed his decision relying solely on the judgment in Original Suit No. 212 as the judgment in Original Suit No. 133 was the subject of a pending second appeal in this Court. It has since been confirmed here in Second Appeal No. 1057 of 1917.

Plaintiff argues first that even if this Court's judgment can be looked at, it will be decisive only as between himself and defendant 4 who were parties to it, not in favour of defendants 1, 2 and 3, who were not and of whom defendants 1 and 2 have paid rent to him for one year and are therefore (together with defendant 3, who holds under them, estopped from denying his title or pleading, as they did, the title of defendant 4. But although this estoppel is mentioned in the plaint it has apparently been relied on only at the hearing before us, not in the grounds of second appeal or in either of the lower Courts, for although the payment of rent on which the estoppel depended was denied no issue was framed regarding it. Plaintiff having impleaded defendant 4 clearly sought a decision against his permanent title and against the claims of the other defendants only as based on it. In the circumstances he must be taken to have waived his plea of estoppel against defendants 1, 2 and 3 and thus the only objection to the character of this Court's judgment as res judicata therefore fails.

Plaintiff argues next that the judgment cannot be looked at because it is not on the record, and we cannot admit it or any other evidence in second appeal. This argument is answered by reference to O. 41, R. 27, and O. 42, R. 1. For there is no reason for holding that the former provision is not applied by the latter to second appeals; and the substantial cause referred to in O. 41, R. 27 (1) (b), is available in the possibility that, if this Court's decision is not considered the result may be two conflicting decrees between the same parties. Plaintiff relies on Ramachandra v. Krishnaji (1) and the judgment of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Raman Menon v. Mammali (2), the suggestion in both cases being that the proper course is not to ask the Court to accept newly discovered evidence in second appeal, but to apply to the trial Court for a review in order to its consideration. But there is nothing in the wording of the rule above referred to to warrant a distinction between newly discovered and other fresh evidence, and we have not been shown that the practice of this Court to refuse to deal with the former is as clearly established as it is apparently in Bombay or was supposed to be by Sadasiva Aiyar, J., here. We see no objection, on grounds of principle or convenience, to the admission in second appeal of a document such as this Court's judgment which could not have been produced earlier because it was not in existence, and which requires no further evidence to explain it. There is no resemblance between these circumstances and those dealt with in the cases relied on, since the evidence offered in them related to a question of fact, and the sole ground on which Spencer, J., concurred in Sadasiva Aiyar J's decision in the Madras case was that it would have been inconvenient to receive it. The conclusion must be that no general rule as to the party's right to have newly discovered evidence taken in second appeal can be laid down, but that each claim must be dealt with on its merits with reference to the existence of the sufficient cause referred to in O. 41, R. 27, and that such cause has been shown in the present case.

Plaintiff's remaining objection is that S. 11, Civil P. C., prohibits the trial of an issue, in which the matter in issue has been in issue in a former suit between the same parties, and as this Court is not holding a trial it is not affected by the prohibition. The question raised in effect is whether the hearing of a second appeal is not a trial. We have been referred to no authoritative definition of a trial and plaintiff's proposal to apply the term only to proceedings in which evidence is or can be taken and questions of fact can be decided, that is, to proceedings before Courts of first instance and first appeal, cannot be accepted. For, apart from the anomaly involved in treating a decision reached on the pleadings as a trial, when it is reached by the Courts last specified, but as other than a trial when, although it would have been reached earlier, it is actually reached on the same materials only in second appeal, the distinction is not maintained in the two cases on which plaintiff relies. For in them the proceedings of a Court of first appeal were in question. In Abdul Majid v. Jew Narain Mahto (3) the High Court no doubt held that the appellate Court "was not holding a trial and, therefore S. 13 of the Code then in force" could not apply and that Court's decision founded on res judicata could not be sustained; and this decision was approved by a Full Bench of this Court in Panchananda Velan v. Vaithinatha Sastrial (4). But the contrary view is implied in Balkishan v. Kishan Lal (5), which was approved in this Court in Venkata Narasimha Appa Row v. Sobhanadri Appa Row (6), and in Calcutta in Midnapore Zemindary Co., Ltd. v. Nitya Kali Dasi (7), in which dissent from Abdul Majid v. Jew Narain Mahto (3) in that decision is unconnected with the preceding statement of the reason for it, that "the doctrine of res judicata did not apply" when, as in the case before the Court, the very object of the appeal in substance if not in form, was to get rid of the adjudication which was said to render the question which the appellate Court was asked to decide res judicata. That observation is, it may be respectfully suggested, intelligible with reference to the case before the Court and to the case in Abdul Majid v. Jew Narain Mahto (3), because res judicata was pleaded in both in respect of a decision in another suit decided on the same evidence as that with which the appeal was connected.

(2) [1917] 39 I. C. 954.

Here that is not the case; and it is therefore unnecessary for us to treat Panchananda Velan v. Vaithinatha Sastrial (4) as conclusive or the reference in it to Abdul Majid v. Jew Narain Mahto (3) as an endorsement of all the dicta contained therein or of that on which plaintiff relies. In accordance with the other decisions above referred to, which include one of this Court, plaintiff's objection to the consideration of this Court's judgment in Second Appeal No. 1057 of 1917 must be disallowed. The foregoing exhausts plaintiff's arguments. The result is that the second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs Criminal Ref. No. 4 of 1919, Decided on 24th February 1919, made by the Sess. Judge, Godavari, in Case No. 2 of 1919.

Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 309, 269 (3) and 307—Sessions Judge must give judgment after recording opinion of assessors.

Under S. 309, the Sessions Judge must give judgment after recording the opinion of the assessors. The mere fact that the accused is charged in the same trial with another offence triable by Jury and that the Judge disagrees with the verdict of the Jury on that charge and desires to make a reference to the High Court, does not absolve the Sessions Judge from his duty to give judgment on the charge tried by him with the aid of assessors. [P 19 C 2]

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Judgment.—It does not appear that the Sessions Judge has followed the directions contained in S. 309, Criminal P. C., which require him to give judgment after recording the opinion of the assessors, to convict if he finds the accused guilty and to pass sentence according to law. The circumstances that in this case the accused is charged in the same trial with another offence triable by Jury S. 269, Cl. (3), Criminal P. C., that the Judge disagrees with the verdict of the Jury on that charge and desires to make a raference under S. 307, Criminal P. C., do not in our opinion, absolve the Sessions Judge from complying with the requirements of S. 309, as regards the offence tried by him with assessors. The reference is therefore premature and we shall send back the case to the learned Sessions Judge to rectify the irregularity and then act according to law.

C. V. Ananthakrishna Aiyar—for Appellants.

T. R. Venkatrama Sastri—for Respondent.

Judgment.—A preliminary objection has been taken that the appeal does not lie the order appealed against being one refusing relief under S. 95, Civil P. C. The principle applied to a similar contention in Ottapurakkal Thazath Suppi v. Alabi Mashur Koyanna Koya Kunhi Koya (1) is applicable to the present case and negatives the objection. On the merits the lower Court's finding amounts at most to this, that the petitioners were in straitened circumstances, had suffered coercive revenue and civil processes on several occasions and, a little before the attachment complained of, had made one alienation. We do not consider their plea that in fact only defendant 1, who is not a petitioner, was responsible for all this, because in our opinion what was proved was in any case insufficient. For it was not proof of what O. 38, R. 5 (1), requires that, when the attachment was made, petitioners were actually about to dispose of their property. In the circumstances we cannot sustain the lower Court's order. An attempt has been made to support it on the ground that S. 95 authorizes the grant of compensation only for attachments improperly ordered pending trial, not for temporary attachments, such as that here in question, which was apparently made under O. 38, R. 5 (3). We find nothing in the language of S. 95, which excludes attachments of the latter class from its operation. Then as to the amount of damages to be awarded, we have considered petitioners' circumstances already referred to and also the facts that the attachment was cancelled after about two months and that no special damage is alleged. We think that petitioners will be compensated sufficiently by an award of Rs. 20. We therefore allow that amount. As they claimed Rs. 1,000, we direct them to pay half respondent's costs in this Court. The lower Court's order disallowing costs to both parties before it will stand.

Criminal Revn. No. 209 of 1918, (taken up No. 16 of 1918) Decided on 22nd July 1918, against order of Dist. Magistrate, Vizagapatam.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 517—Proceedings under preventive sections fall within "inquiry" or "trial."

Proceedings under the preventive sections fall within the meaning of the expression "inquiry" or "trial" in S. 517 of the Code. [P 21 C 2]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 109 and 110—Proceedings under—Court has jurisdiction to confiscate property produced before it even in absence of proof that offence was committed with respect to that property—Criminal P. C., S. 517.

A Court dealing with an accused person under Ss. 109 and 110 of the Code has jurisdiction, for sufficient cause, to confiscate property produced before it or in its custody even in the absence of proof that any offence was committed with respect to that property or that it was used for the commission of an offence. [P 22 C 1]

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—This is a case taken up in revision by Ayling, J., on a perusal of the calendar. These persons were put up by the police before the Joint Magistrate of Vizianagaram in order that the Magistrate might take proceedings against them under S. 109, Criminal P. C., requiring them to execute bonds with sureties for their good behaviour. Now under S. 109 security can be required either on the ground that a person is taking precautions to conceal his presence and is taking such precautions with a view to committing an offence, or on the ground that a person has no ostensible means of subsistence, or cannot give a satisfactory account of himself. Then S. 110 provides that certain specially qualified Magistrates may require the execution of a similar bond with sureties for good behaviour if a person is by habit a robber, house-braker or thief or a receiver of stolen property by habit and so on. Now the Joint Magistrate has passed his order not under S. 110, but under S. 109 on the ground that these six persons had no ostensible means of subsistence and could not give a satisfactory account of themselves; that is, under Cl. (b), S. 109. Then he further passed an order confiscating Rs. 211 found with accused 3 the word "accused" being used in a loose sense so as to include persons called upon to furnish security, Rs. 260 found with accused 4 and Rs. 213 found with accused 6 besides keys, ornaments and cloths found with accused 4 and 5. (The Joint Magistrate does not mention the provision of law under which he passed the order of confiscation).

As S. 118, Criminal P. C., under which orders are passed in proceedings taken under Ss. 107 to 110, is preceded by S. 117 which provides for an inquiry into the truth of the information on which an order is to be passed, I take it that the order of confiscation was passed under S. 517, Cl. (1). That section is as follows :

> "When an inquiry or trial in any criminal Court is concluded, the Court may make such order as it thinks fit for the disposal of any property or document produced before it or in its custody or regarding which any offence appears to have been committed or which has been used for the commission of any offence."

There can be no doubt that the property with reference to which the confiscation order was passed was property produced before a criminal Court (that is the Joint Magistrate) that an inquiry in the said criminal Court under S. 117, Criminal P. C., and that the Joint Magistrate had therefore jurisdiction to pass the order for the disposal of the property because it was produced before him, though there may be no proof that any offence had been committed with reference to that property even if the word "property" by the explanation to the same section included other property which had been converted into the property produced before the Court. In this connexion I might refer to the case in Govindaraja Padayachi, In re (1), in which a Bench of this Court (Abdur Rahim and Ayling, JJ.) held that under S. 517, Cl. (1), the criminal Court has power to pass confiscation orders only in respect of property regarding which an offence appears to have been committed and that the Court cannot pass such orders on the mere fact that the property had been produced before the Court in an inquiry. No doubt under the corresponding S. 517 of the Act of 1882 the words "regarding which any offence appears to have been committed" qualify the words "produced before it", but the words "or in its custody" and the word "or" have again been introduced in the later Code of 1898 before the word "regarding" and as pointed out in Russul Bibee v. Ahmed Moosajee (2) this alteration clearly extended the powers of the criminal Court to make orders about the disposal of all property produced before it in an inquiry even without an expression of opinion on the part of the Court that any offence appeared to have been committed regarding it. I therefore respectfully dissent from the decision in Govindaraja Padayachi, In re (1).

Napier, J.—This case taken up by the High Court arises out of proceedings taken by the Joint Magistrate of Vizianagaram under S. 109, Criminal P. C. He made an order under that section against certain persons to execute bonds with sureties for good behaviour and also made an order for confiscation of cash and pieces of broken jewellery and cloths found in their possession. The persons against whom the order was made appealed to the District Magistrate who upheld both the orders, and they themselves have not applied to us in revision, but the propriety or correctness of the order as to confiscation was doubted by a Judge of this Court and has been put before us for disposal. The order must have been, I think, made under S. 517. I had at first doubts whether proceedings under the preventive sections of the Code come within what is an inquiry or trial in the section. But as has been pointed out by my learned brother, such proceedings are called an inquiry in those sections, and therefore the section cannot be limited to preliminary inquiries before Magistrates. I would therefore hold that orders can be made in inquiries under the preventive sections.

(1) [1915] 31 I. C. 827.
(2) [1907] 34 Cal. 347.

The next question is whether S. 517 covers property which has come before the Court in the circumstances of this case. It has been held by a Bench of this Court in Criminal Revision Case No. 570 of 1915 that orders can be passed in an inquiry under the preventive sections, but that the order cannot be passed unless it has been shown that the property with regard to which the order is made is such that an offence appears to have been committed with respect to it or that it has been used for the commission of an offence. With respect to the learned Judges who decided that case, I think that they had overlooked the language of the present Code. The same view was taken in the case of Surendra Nath Sarma v. Rai Mohan Das (3) and that case was relied on in a subsequent case, Russul Bibee v. Ahmad Moosajee (2). The learned Judges in the latter case pointed out that the Bench which decided Surendra Nath Sarma v. Rai Mohan Das (3) had overlooked the amendment of the Code; and with great respect this is what the learned Judges who decided the case above referred to in our Court seem to me to have done. The language of the old Code was, as pointed out by my learned brother, limited to property in respect of which an offence appears to have been committed or which has been used for the commission of an offence, whereas the language of the present Code is quite clear and extends the mischief of the section to any property produced before the Court or in its custody. Differing therefore with the decision in Criminal Revision Case No. 570 of 1915, Govindaraja Padayachi, In re (1). I am of opinion that there is power in Courts acting under the preventive sections to make an order with regard to a property which has been produced before it.

Civil Revn. No. 81 of 1918, Decided on 3rd February 1919, from decree of Sub-Judge, Ramnad, in Small Cause Suit No. 198 of 1917.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, Para 20—Award directing payment of money and dissolution of marriage cannot be filed by Small Cause Court.

A Small Cause Court has no jurisdiction to file an award under para. 20, which, though it directs payment of money within the pecuniary limits of its jurisdiction, goes on to declare the dissolution of marriage between the parties. [P 23 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, Para. 20—Jurisdiction to file award depends on entire award—Jurisdiction cannot be conferred by only asking those reliefs that are within Court's competence if others are not so.

The jurisdiction of a Court to file an award depends on the reliefs awarded by the award. It is not open to a party to confer jurisdiction on a Court by asking for only one relief granted by the award and getting the award filed under para. 20, where the other reliefs granted are beyond the competence of the Court: A. I. R. 1914 Cal. 683 and 19 I. C. 882, Expl. [P 23 C 1]

(c) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Sch. 2, Para. 20—"Subject-matter" in para. 20 refers to entire awards and not portion of it.

The expression "subject-matter of the award" in the paragraph means the whole matter dealt with and decreed by the award, and not any particular portion which affects any particular party. [P 23 C 1 2]

(d) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Sch. 2, Paras. 15 and 20—Waiver by parties of irregularities must be with knowledge of them.

Irregularities in the procedure adopted by an arbitrator may be waived by the parties, provided they know of the irregularities and waive them with such knowledge. [P 27 C 1,2]

K. Bashyam Iyangar—for Petitioners.

K. A. Rajah Aiyyar—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—It is clear from the plaint that the suit is to file the award under S. 20, Sch. 2, Civil P. C,, and to direct payment of the money decided by the arbitrators as payable to the plaintiff by the defendants. The Subordinate Judge has in his judgment refused to file the award. The award, after directing the defendants to pay plaintiffs Rupees 427-1-7 with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, declares the dissolution of the marriage between plaintiff 2 and defendant 2. The arbitrators decide that the marriage between the parties has been dissolved pursuant to the custom in vogue amongst the members of the caste and state that "henceforth there shall be no manner of connexion between plaintiff 2 and defendant 2".

"as sanctioned by the custom of the caste each party shall be at liberty to marry according to his or her pleasure."

I do not think that the Small Cause Court has jurisdiction to file an award which, though it directs payment of money within the pecuniary limits of its jurisdiction, goes on to declare the dissolution of marriage between the parties. S. 20, Sch. 2, Civil P. C., directs the filing of the award in any Court "having jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the award." By "subject-matter of the award" I think is meant the whole matter dealt with and decreed by the award and not any particular portion which affects any particular party. The jurisdiction of the Court will depend upon the reliefs awarded by the award. Mohesh Chandra Kundu v. Amar Chandra Kundu (1) and Raghavendra Ayyaji Desai v. Gururao Raghavendra Desai (2) referred to by the Subordinate Judge do not decide that it is open to a party to confer jurisdiction on a Court by asking for only one relief granted by the award and getting the award filed under S. 20, though the other reliefs granted are beyond the competence of the Court. If the suit was simply a suit for a decree in respect of the amount decided by the arbitrators without any prayer to file the award under S. 20 the jurisdiction of the Court will no doubt depend on the amount awarded without reference to the subject-matter of the original dispute but when it is sought to file the whole award under S. 20 the reliefs granted by the arbitrators must govern jurisdiction.

On the merits the Subordinate Judge has failed to note that it was open to the parties to waive any error in the procedure adopted by the arbitrators and to see how far the fact that the parties supplied the stamp paper for the award (see Ex. C), and did not object to evidence recorded by one arbitrator in the absence of others being referred to by them, would cure the defect noted by the Judge. That irregularities might be waived is clear from Manindra Nath Mandal v. Mohanunda Roy (3) and Moseley v. Simpson (4); it must of course be shown that the parties knew of the irregularities and waived them with such knowledge.

I direct that the application to file the award be returned by the lower Court to be presented to the proper Court. I make no order as to costs.

Judgment.—The appeal is filed against an order passed by the Judge of a Court of Small Causes under S. 95, Civil P. C. We have not been shown any reason for departing from the general principle that no appeal lies against an order passed on the small cause side, and we dissent from the decision to the contrary effect in Karumuru Venkateswami v. Lanka Tripuriah (1).

We have been asked, if no appeal lies to deal with the matter in the exercise of our revisional powers. But the lower Court's decision is in our opinion correct. The civil revision petition is dismissed with costs.

Order.—In this petition we are asked to revise the judgment of the Sessions Judge of Madura upholding the conviction of the accused for an offence under R. 29 of the rules framed under the Defence of India Act of 1915 for having dissuaded one Ramu Pillai from entering into military service. It was contended by Mr. A. Subbarama Aiyar, in the course of his able argument, first, that there was no such offence in the Madras Presidency, and secondly, that if it was an offence the Court of the Subdivisional Magistrate of Melur had no jurisdiction to try the charge in that (1) the ordinary Courts of the country have no jurisdiction, (2) there was no previous consent of the District Magistrate as required by the Act. After hearing the Advocate-General in reply we had no doubt that the petition must be dismissed, but thought it advisable to give our reasons in a written judgment in view of the importance of the questions raised.

The first argument is based on the peculiar arrangement of the Act. Under S. 1, sub-S. (3), it is provided that Ss. 1 and 2 shall come into operation at once, and that as for the rest of the Act it shall only come into operation in any province on notification by the Governor-General in Council in the Gazette of India. S. 2 empowers the Governor-General in Council to make rules for various general purposes and in particular for certain specified purposes, one of which is to prevent any attempt to dissuade persons from entering into the military or police services of His Majesty (Cl. h). Sub.S. 2 of the same section says that rules made under this section may provide that any contravention thereof should be punished with imprisonment up to a term of seven years or with fine, etc. Sub-S. 3 provides that all rules made under this section shall be published in the Gazette of India and shall thereupon have effect as if enacted in this Act. The whole of these rules were admittedly published in the Gazette of India. It is argued before us that the words "enacted in this Act" must be read to mean that the rules became an additional section to the Act and that as only Ss. 1 and 2 came into operation at once, the rules, being treated as the rest of the Act, can only come into operation after notification as provided in S. 1, sub-S. (3). This argument will, of course, reduce the Act to an absurdity. The scheme of the Act is to provide for the creation of rules and offences to apply at once to the whole of India and also to create in certain special conditions tribunals for the purpose of ousting the jurisdiction of the ordinary criminal Courts in any province or part thereof to which the Governor-General by notification has made the remaining provisions of the Act applicable. To give effect to the contention would be to render the whole Act nugatory in spite of S. 1, sub-S. (3), which provides that Ss. 1 and 2 shall come into operation at once. It is of course our duty to construe an act in such a manner as to give effect to its provisions if it is possible to do so, and this can be done by reading the rules as part of the section under which they are framed, and not as part of the rest of the Act. It is quite clear that where S. 1, sub-S. (3), was speaking of the rest of the Act coming into operation, it was referring to the subsequent sections, and not to the rules which are to be framed under S. 2 and to have effect as if enacted in this Act.

An argument was addressed on the construction of S. 22, General Clauses Act (10 of 1897), which provides that where by any Act, which is not to come into force immediately on the passing thereof a power is conferred to make rules, such rules shall not take effect till the commencement of the Act; and it was sought to introduce into the section words which would make it read, "where by any Act a part of which is not to come into force immediately on the passing thereof, a power is conferred to make any rules, etc., such rules shall not take effect until the whole of the Act shall come into force."

It is not permissible to make any such addition to the section which would have the effect of negativing the purpose of the section, which is simply to provide power to make the rules although the Act has not come into force, but to reserve their application. In addition to this there is direct authority of the House of Lords against the contention. It is to be found in the case of Chartered Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood (1). In that case Lord Herschell clearly laid down that, where the section gives power to make rules, the rules are to be read as part of the section, his language being (para 358):

"Every rule which is intra vires at all events . . . . is to be read into the section, and have just the same effect as if it had been contained in the Act itself."

For these reasons we are satisfied that the rules came into force directly they were published in the Gazette and therefore, that the offence is created.

The argument that such offence can only be tried by a Special Tribunal fails entirely, unless it is shown that sub-Ss. 3 to 11 have been applied to the Madras Presidency. At it has been conceded that they have not been so applied, and the whole of the first argument has been based on that assumption, there is no foundation for this contention. We prefer therefore to leave the consideration of the effect of Ss. 3 and 4 of the Act until such a time as these sections are so applied, or to the Courts of the Provinces where they are in force. S. 4, Cl. (a), Criminal P.C., defines "offence" as "any act or omission made punishable by any law for the time being in force", and S. 29 provides that any offence under any other law (which means any law other than the Indian Penal Code) shall, when no Court is mentioned in this behalf in such law, be tried by the High Court or by any Court constituted under this Code by which such offence is shown in Cl. 8 Sch. 2, to be triable. Ss. 3 to 11 of the Special Act not being in force in this Presidency, there is no Court mentioned in this behalf. The Second Schedule provides under the heading "Offences against other laws" for the trial of an offence punishable as this is by a Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the First Class. There can therefore be no doubt that the trying Court had jurisdiction if the case was put before it in a proper manner.

The point is taken however that there was no previous consent by a District Magistrate as required by R. 30. It was somewhat faintly argued that as neither the Defence of India Act nor the General Clauses Act define the words "District Magistrate," there was nothing to show what was meant by those words. We are clear however that where the procedure for the trial of an offence is that under the Criminal Procedure Code, we must look to the provisions of that Code for the meaning of the words used. District Magistrates were created by the Codes of Criminal Procedure, and S. 10 of the Code provides that in every district outside the Presidency town the Local Government shall appoint a Magistrate of the First Class who shall be called the District Magistrate. The point really pressed on us was that Mr. Reilly who gave the consent was not the actual District Magistrate. It appears however from the Gazette of the Government of Madras of 25th April 1916 that he was appointed to act as District Magistrate from 1st June 1916. Then S. 17, Cl. (1), General Clauses Act, provides that in any Act it shall be sufficient for the purpose of indicating the application of the law to every person for the time being executing the functions of an office to mention the official title of the officer at present executing the functions. The result of this provision is that the words of R. 20 of the Defence of India Act must be read as if they contained after the words "District Magistrate" the words "Acting District Magistrate or Magistrate executing the functions of a District Magistrate." There can be no doubt therefore that Mr. Reilly was competent as Acting District Magistrate to give the consent, and this point therefore fails. In the result the petition is dismissed.

Second Appeals Nos. 571 to 579 and 773 to 776 of 1916, and 169 and 170 of 1917, Decided on 10th September 1918, against decrees of Dist. Judge, Ramnad, in Appl. Suits Nos. 173 to 178, 180 to 182, 355 to 358, 283 and 284 of 1915 respectively.

(a) Madras Estates Land Act (1908), S. 13 (3)—Temporary wells by which crops are grown are improvements—Improvement can be temporary.

Temporary wells by which crops are grown are improvements within the meaning of S. 13 (3) and a charge for vanpayir is legally leviable in respect thereof. The expression "improvement" in the section is not restricted to permanent, improvements but also includes temporary improvements which materially enhance the value of the holding for the period during which they are in existence. [P 28 C 1]

(b) Landlord and Tenant—Rent—Custom not to charge for dry waste lands unless left waste by wilful default—Landlord should prove default.

Where a custom exists in a holding whereby waste dry lands are not chargeable unless left waste by wilful default, the onus is on the landlord to prove the default on which he relies to make the waste land chargeable. [P 26 C 2]

Judgment.—The series of decisions in the District Court and High Court relied on by the District Judge do not altogether establish a custom that waste is not chargeable even if it be due to the raiyats' wilful neglect: vide Arunachallam Chettiar v. Mangalam (1) and Udayal v. Arunachala Chettiar (2); and Ramasami Servaigaran v. Athivaraha Chariar (3) recently decided. The custom upheld in those cases was that waste dry lands were not chargeable unless left waste by wilful neglect. The District Judge is therefore directed to reconsider his finding and decide whether the custom found by him is supported by the evidence or whether the custom is as found in the cases referred to above. In the latter case, he must further decide whether plaintiff has proved that any of the waste in these suits was due to defendants' wilful neglect. The finding should be submitted within six weeks from this date and ten days will be allowed for filing objections.

Finding.—I have been directed to submit a finding on the following issue:

"Whether the custom found by the District Judge is supported by the evidence or whether the custom is as found in the cases referred to above, and in the latter case, whether plaintiff has proved that any of the waste in these suits was due to the defendants' neglect."

My predecessor observed that

"the evidence in the case is that certain portions of holdings were left uncultivated in suit Faslis, that this was not due to default on the part of the raiyats, that rent has never been charged on waste but that the question has been raised and contested, but not settled, between the landlord and raiyats since Fasli 1318."

He also relied on certain decisions in support of the view that rent was not chargeable on waste. As regards the decisions relied on by my predecesssor, their Lordships observe that they "do not altogether establish a custom that waste is not chargeable even if it be due to the raiyats' wilful neglect" and that the custom upheld in the reported cases was:

"that waste dry lands were not chargeable unless left waste by wilful neglect."

Now to come to the oral evidence on record, I find that the only matter that has been satisfactorily proved is that no charge used to be made for waste till Fasli 1317 and that from Fasli 1318 the matter has been under litigation. The witnesses examined on both sides swear generally that it is not customary to charge for waste. But the question does not appear to have been put to them specifically whether the custom they referred to is an absolute custom, irrespective of default on the part of the raiyats. I am not therefore prepared to find upon the strength of these loose statements that such an absolute custom has been established. The mere omission or failure to collect rent for waste lands until Fasli 1317 is not sufficient to establish a custom that such lands could never be charged even if they were left waste through the wilful neglect of the tenants. I may also add that such a custom, even if established by the evidence, must be rejected as unreasonable. The following observations of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Ramasami Servarigaran v. Athivaraha Chariar (3) appear to me to be pertinent: "I do not think that a custom to let lands lie waste (without regard to reasonable area and without regard to good or bad seasons and existence or absence of facilities for irrigation) for indefinite periods at the tenants' sweet will and pleasure with absolute feedom from liability to payment of any rent is a reasonable custom which can be recognised by Courts: Ramasami Servaigaran v. Athivaraha Chariar (3):

(1) [1916] 40 Mad. 640=35 I. C. 329.

(2) [1915] 27 I. C. 872.

(3) [1918] 44 I. C. 663.

I find on the first part of the issue that the evidence is not sufficient to establish an absolute cuatom which appears to have been found by my predecessor. I find that the custom is as found in the cases referred to in the order of remand.

The next question I am to consider is whether plaintiff has proved that any of the waste in these suits was due to the defendants' wilful neglect. No question appears to have been put about this matter during the examination of P. W. 1. P. W. 2 swears that land No. 170 is cultivable though sandy, that land No. 317 is quite fit for cultivation, that land No. 1186 is cultivable land, that land No. 163 may be cultivated once in 3 or 4 years and with trouble taken by the raiyat and that if there is heavy rain land No. 392 may be cultivated with horse-gram, that about 2 kulis of land No. 330 are cultivable in parts and that on the rest of the lands horse-gram may be grown when there is heavy rain. He states further that 1½ or 2 kulis of land No. 571 is covered with a tope and that the remainder of the land is cultivable, that land No. 214 is a little high but is cultivable and that No. 289 is not saline but quite fit for cultivation. In fact the evidence of P. W. 2 shows that the lands which are said to be uncultivable could be cultivated.

D. W. 1 swears that in Faslis 1321 and 1322 lands Nos. 602, 681, 607, 424, 1354 and 1355 were cultivated, that lands Nos. 163, 325, 326 aud 330 were waste being sandy and high level and that lands No. 1353, 1354 and 1355 are kollais in village-site. He admits in re-examination that all the waste lands may become cultivable when there is timely rain, though he adds that there was no sufficient rain in the suit faslis. D. W. 2 swears that except 10 kurukkams in land No. 317 the rest is cultivable and that 6 kurukkams out of the said 10 kurukkams form a watercourse. D. W. 3 swears that some of the lands were cultivated in the suit faslis and that other lands were left waste. But he admits that they could also be cultivated if there was sufficient rain. I have no doubt upoh the oral evidence of the witnesses examined in the case that the lands are capable of cultivation provided there is sufficient rain. The next question for consideration is whether during the suit faslis there was or was not sufficient rain for the cultivation of the lands in dispute. There is nothing in the evidence of plaintiff's witnesses about this matter, but the witnesses examined for the defendants swear that there was not sufficient rain. But they are all interested witnesses and I am not prepared to act upon their evidence. The decision turns therefore on the question as to whether the burden of proof lies on the plaintiff or on the defendants. In the case referred to above, Sadasiva Aiyar, J., observes that it would lie on the raiyats to prove that the lands were left waste not through any default on their part. If that view should be upheld, my finding will be that the raiyats have not proved to my satisfaction that they had not sufficient facilities for cultivating the lands in question during the suit faslis. I find however that the issue as remitted in the order of remand directs me to find whether plaintiff has proved that any of the waste in these suits was due to defendants' wilful neglect. If their Lordships intended to throw the burden on the plaintiff, I must find that he has not made out wilful neglect on the part of the tenants. After the return of the finding upon the issue referred the Court delivered the following

Judgment.—We accept the finding that the custom is that waste dry lands are not chargeable unless left waste by wilful default. This was the custom referred to in the order of remand and we cannot go behind that order now. On this finding we think that the burden of proving wilful default is on the landlord. The finding is that no charge has ever been made for waste dry lands, and under the law as varied by the custom the contract between the parties is that waste lands are not to be charged unless left waste by the wilful default of the tenant. In this view it is undoubtedly incumbent on the landlord to prove the default on which he relies to make the waste land chargeable. The District Judge finds that he has not discharged this burden and we accept this finding. As regards the charge for vanpayir, the Judge finds in Second Appeal No. 169 of 1917 that the temporary wells, by aid of which the crops were grown, are improvements within the meaning of S. 13 (3), Estates Land Act. We accept this finding and would apply it also in the other cases in which no such finding is given, for we can see no reason to restrict the meaning of improvement to a permanent improvement, for temporary improvements can materially enhance the value of the holding for the period during which they are in existence.

On another ground plaintiff's claim to cropwar rents must be disallowed. The tenants admitted only a rate of 5½ fanams per kurukkam, and the District Judge finds that plaintiff has failed to prove any other rates to be payable. The second appeals are accordingly dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 1034 of 1918, Decided on 6th March 1919, against decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Palghat, in Appeal Suit No. 333 of 1917.

Malabar Law—Tavazi—Woman can have two exclusive branches of tavazis formed of children by two husbands.

The tavazhi of a woman may consist of two branches, one branch made up of children by one husband and the other branch of children by another husband, and each branch might own separate properties acquired from their respective fathers. In other words a separate branch of a tavazhi can be established consisting of a woman and her children by one husband to the exclusion of the children by another husband. [P 29 C 1]

C. V. Ananthakrishna Aiyar and K. P. Ramakrishna Aiyar—for Appellants.

K. P. M. Menon—for Respondents.

Judgment.—Plaintiff sues as Karnavan of Eranhipurath Tarwad to recover the plaint properties from defendant 8. The plaint property was acquired in the names of Ooli Amma and Kelu Nair, who is her eldest son by her second husband. Ooli Amma married twice and had some children by her first husband Rarappan Nair, who divorced her. She afterwards married Raman Nair, by whom she had a son Kelu Nair and other children.

The real question for decision is whether the plaint property belonged to Ooli Amma and all her children by both the husbands, or whether it belonged to her and her children by the second husband alone. The main contention for the respondents is that there could be no separate tavazhi consisting of the children by one husband alone. The facts as found are as follows: The plaint property was acquired in the names of Ooli Amma and Kelu Nair, the son of Raman Nair. The learned Subordinate Judge does not believe plaintiff's evidence that the property was given to Ooli Amma by her first husband Rarappan Nair, and he also finds that it is not proved that it was given to her children by her second husband Raman Nair. It is however admitted that Raman Nair did give certain properties to his wife and his children by her as is evidenced by Exs. 16 and 17, but the plaint property is not included in those documents. We therefore see that Ooli Amma had some properties which she got from her husband Raman Nair for herself and his children, as it does not appear that she had any other friends. The presumption would be that any additional property which she obtained was acquired out of the proceeds of the property she so held. The Subordinate Judge merely says that Rarappan Nair might have given something to Ooli Amma. This cannot be treated as a finding, but on the finding that the plaint property is not proved to have been given by Rarappan Nair, we are thrown back on the presumption that the property was acquired with the funds already in Ooli Amma's lands.

There remains the real question for consideration, and that is whether a separate branch of a tavazhi can be established consisting of a woman and her children by one husband to the exclusion of the children by another husband. Where property is given to his family by a father, it is held with all the incidents of Tarwad tenure, Kunhacha Umma v. Kutti Mammi Hajee (1), and this view is based on the presumed intention of the father to benefit his own children. If therefore the second husband gives property to his wife and his own children, it is difficult to presume that he intended also to benefit the children by the former husband or even children by a subsequent husband, in the absence of any expression of such intention. No doubt the word "tavazhi" may be as suggested by Sankaran Nair, J., derived from tayor (mother) and vazhi (way), and would naturally include all the descendants of that woman. But even though that is the real meaning of tavazhi, it has been held that branches of a Tarwad consisting of persons who have acquired separate property from their father are constituted as tavazhi by virtue of the possession of that property. If therefore the property was intended for that man's children alone, there is no reason for adding to the branch which is to enjoy that property the children by another husband.

The very fact that these tavazhis are very frequently called puthravakkasam tavazhis leads to the inference that they are not merely descendants of one female but also branches of the family which are benefited by a gift from their father and are thereby constituted as tavazhis. In this view there is no real difficulty in supposing that the tavazhi of a woman could consist of two branches, one branch made up of children by one husband and the other of children by another husband, and each branch might own separate properties obtained from their respective fathers. This has been recognized by Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Chakkara Kannan v. Kunhi Pokker (2) and apparently is the view taken in Travancore. No doubt Sankaran Nair, J., in the same case at (p. 324 of 39 Mad.) suggests that children born by another husband, would benefit in the gift made by the first husband, and he proceeds on the assumption that a tavazhi must consist of a woman and all her children by whomsoever begotten. Srinivasa Ayengar, J., also assumes that a tavazhi must consist of a woman and all her children by the various husbands, but he goes on to say that "it is certainly difficult to presume an intention in the first husband to grant the property to his wife's children by another husband. Such cases are likely to occur very rarely."

Neither of these learned Judges has considered the possibility of branches within the tavazhi and as pointed out by Sadasiva Aiyar, J., when there are branches within a Tarwad there is really no reason why there could not be similar branches within the tavazhi. If the possibility of that is conceded, then undoubtedly Ooli Amma and her children by Raman Nair would constitute a separate branch and we think that that was the effect of the gifts in their favour by Raman Nair. If that is so plaintiff as the Karnavan of the main Tarwad would have no interest in these properties, although he is a descendant of Ooli Amma by Rarappan Nair, and would have no right to interfere with the alienation of the property by members of the branch consisting of the children of Raman Nair.

Apart from this point there is the question of adverse possession. The plaint property has been dealt with ever since 1875 by the sons of Raman Nair, although at the time these dealings took place there were members of the Tarwad senior to them. In fact at one period Kanaran Nair, son of Ooli Amma by Rarappan Nair, was Karnavan of the Tarwad when the property was dealt with by the children of the other husband, and also later on Benares Govindan Nair was the Karnavan and his claim in respect of other properties of the subtavazhi was disallowed in a suit brought by him. No doubt the learned Subordinate Judge has found that there was no adverse possession by this tavazhi. But for coming to this conclusion he has relied upon a proposition for which there is apparently no support on the record, for he says that "it is not uncommon in Malabar to take demises in the names of junior members of the Tarwad." This may be correct but it is not in evidence in this case, and when it is remembered that the demise was taken in the name of a man who was not only a junior member of the main Tarwad but might be also the Karnavan of a branch, the case bears a somewhat different appearance. The delaying of this property by this tavazhi was to the knowledge of the plaintiff's predecessors and apparently of plaintiff himself, and consequently of the fact that it has been so dealt with for the first 40 years would constitute adverse possession against the Tarwad of which plaintiff is now the Karnavan. The appeal must accordingly be allowed and the suit dismissed with defendant 8's costs throughout.

In an administration suit the Court has jurisdiction to make a defendant a plaintiff to enable him to have the estate administered himself.

It is not necessary that as a condition precedent to the applicability of O. 1, R. 10, the Court should expressly find that there was a bona fide mistake in the array of parties. [P 30 C 2]

H. Bala Krishna Row—for Petitioner.

T. R. Venkatrama Sastri—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—This suit is in the nature of an administration suit and asks for accounts to be taken of the deceased's estate and to administer it in accordance with his will. In the administration properties will no doubt be partitioned and given to various persons entitled. Defendant 5 is one of those persons so entitled and though he was originally arranged as a defendant, I see no objection to his being made a plaintiff to claim his share. It is argued that as the original plaintiff had no right to institute the suit, this suit would have been dismissed and that the Court has no jurisdiction to add a new plaintiff as it has done. The question whether the original plaintiff has a right or not, has not been found yet. It is a matter of controversy between the parties. But even if we assume for argument that he would ultimately be found to have no interest, that is no bar to adding a new plaintiff. [Vide Krishna Boi v. Collector and Government Agent, Tanjore (1).] It was next argued that no bona fide mistake is found by the trial Judge to apply O. 1, R. 10, Civil P. C. This being however an administration suit, as I have already out, I do not think it is neeessary to find it expressly. Defendant 5 is entitled to have the estate administered himself.

There is no ground for interference under S. 115, Civil P. C. The petition is dismissed with costs.

A Sub-Magistrate, acting under Ss. 65 and 190 in respect of a complaint under S. 448, I. P. C., went to a temple, where the accused were in hiding and arrested them, although he had passed no final order on the occurrence report which he had received the day previous:

[P 31 C 1]

V. Ramesam and N. Kunjitapatam Ayyar—for Appellants.

C. Rama Rao for P. Narayanamoorthy—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The pleadings clearly state that the defendant 2, the Sub-Magistrate, was acting under S. 190 and 65, Criminal P. C., in respect of a complaint under S. 448, I. P. C., when he went to the temple and found the plaintiffs barricading themselves inside and refusing to open the door, and then arrested them, releasing them immediately after on their recognizance to appear to answer a charge under S. 448, I. P. C. His acts and those of defendant 1, the Inspector of Police, were perfectly legal. The Subordinate Judge has misread the evidence of the Sub-Magistrate, who does not say that he had disposed of the occurrence report which reached him on the previous day. As he has passed no final order on the report, it was open to him to take action upon it next day, and further under S. 190 (1) (c) the facts which he saw at the temple were sufficient to justify him in taking action independently of the occurrence report. We set aside the decree of the Subordinate Judge and restore that of the District Munsif with costs here and in the lower appellate Court.

K. R. Gurusami Aiyar and A. Subbaram Aiyar—for Appellants

M. D. Devadoss—for Respondents.

Judgment.—We agree with the lower Court that the suit is barred by limitation, although in our opinion the appropriate Article is Art. 142, and not Art. 131 Lim. Act. The suit is in effect for possession of the temple and the value of the temple itself is specifically included in the plaint valuation of the suit. The judgment in Eshan Chunder Roy v. Monmohini Dassi (1), which is relied on by appellants' vakil, proceeds on the basis that no interest in immovable property was involved and Ramanathan Chetty v. Murugappa Chetty (2), Gnanasambanda Pandara Sannadhi v. Velu Pandaram (3) and Charapattada Siddalinga Swamulu v. Sondur Ramachandra Charlu (4) all support the view that Art. 142 is the proper article to apply in the present case.

But this makes the case of plaintiffs worse for under Art. 142 the burden of proof must rest on plaintiffs, and on the meagre evidence on record we have no hesitation whatever in holding that they have not discharged it. The appeal is dismissed with costs as also the memorandum of objection.

Letters Patent Appeal No. 73 of 1917, Decided on 15th January 1918, against judgment of Seshagiri Aiyar, J., in Criminal Revision Petition No. 413 of 1916.

(a) Madras Local Boards Act (5 of 1884), S. 73—Cess—Liability of tenant to pay is only to landlord for portion actually paid.

A landlord is primarily liable to Government under S. 73 and a tenant is liable only to the landlord in respect of the portion of cess which the latter has actually paid and contingently on his having made the payment: 27 I. C. 22, Foll. [P 32 C 1]

(b) Limitation Act (9 of 1908), Arts. 61 and 120—Suit by landlord to recover cess paid by him from tenant—Arts. 120 and not 61 applies.

A suit by a landlord to recover from the tenant the cess actually paid by him must be instituted within the period prescribed by Art. 120, and not by Art 61. [P 32 C 1]

L. A. Govindaraghava Aiyar—for Appellant.

Judgment.—The sum at stake in this Letters Patent Appeal is small and presumably for that reason the appeal has not been opposed. Looking at the terms of the Local Boards Act, we regret that we are unable to agree with the material portion of the learned Judge's judgment, that in which he holds the tenant liable to Government. The contrary view that only the landholder is liable to Government was taken by Tyabji, J., in Puchakayala Jagannaikulu v. Manager of Nandigam Estate (1) and is, we think, entailed by the language of S. 73, Local Boards Act, the only liability of the tenant being that imposed by the proviso thereto. He is liable only to the landlord in respect of the portion of the cess which the latter has actually paid and contingently on his having made the payment. Taking this view, we cannot apply Art. 61, Sch. I, Lim. Act, since it applies to cases of money paid by the plaintiff on behalf of the defendants, and plaintiff's payment was not of that description. No other contention being suggested, the Article applicable is No. 120. The decision of the learned Judge must therefore be set aside and that of the lower Court must be modified by addition of Rs. 5-6-0 to the decree amount, Rs. 3-15-1. Defendants will pay half plaintiff's costs in this Court.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 153 of 1918, Decided on 7th March 1919, against decree of Court of Dist. Munsif, Melur, in Sm. C. C. Suit No. 1169 of 1917.

Contract Act (9 of 1872), S. 23—Agreement to serve in lieu of interest of debt is not illegal.

A stipulation in a bond whereby the debtor contracts to work for a specified term in lieu of payment of interest is not opposed to public policy and is enforceable. There is little difference between such contract and one of apprenticeship. [P 32 C 2]

K. V. Krishnaswamy Aiyar—for Petitioners.

Judgment.—This case is by no means identical with Ram Sarup v. Bhagat Bansi Mandar (1), in which the debtor bound himself to serve until the debt was repaid and in default to pay exorbitant interest. Here the debtor only undertakes to work for five years, and this undertaking is accepted by the creditor in lieu of interest. There is nothing to prevent the debtor leaving service at the end of five years, and if he commits default he has to repay the advance with 25 per cent interest. This can by no means be called a contract of slavery, for the work done by the debtor is to be paid for at the ordinary rates and the agreement to continue in service is treated by the employer as consideration equivalent to interest. Respondents are not unfortunately represented in this Court, but there seems to me very little difference between such a contract and one of apprenticeship or indenture and therefore it cannot be treated as opposed to public policy. It appears that respondents completed their contract so far as the labour was concerned and plaintiff can only claim his principal amount subject to limitation or any subsequent contract. The decree is set aside and the suit remanded for disposal in the light of the above remarks. Costs will abide the result.

Civil Appeal No. 84 of 1918, Decided on 19th February 1919, from decree of Sub-Judge, Trichinopoly, in Original Suit No. 41 of 1916.

Hindu Law—Widow—Compromise by—If in interest of estate is binding— Reversioner can challenge it on ground of absence of care and negligence in effecting compromise.

Where there is a litigation pending in the subject-matter of which a Hindu widow is interested, she has a discretion as to how to conduct that litigation and to come to an arrangement with her opponent, if she believes that it would be in the interests of the estate. But a reversioner is entitled to show that the compromise was not arrived at with due care and caution and was such as really showed negligence on the part of the widow, and if he succeeds in showing that, the compromise will not be binding upon him. [P 34 C 1]

T. V. Muthukrishna Aiyar — for Appellant.

T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, K. S. Ganesa Aiyar and Sundara Row — for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—The first question raised in the appeal relates to the effect of a compromise in a previous proceeding between defendant 2, the widow of Krishnaswami Konar, his father, Karuppanna Pillai, his brother, Perumal, and defendant 1. Krishnaswami Konar who died in 1907, had, by his first wife, two daughters, the plaintiff, and another daughter now deceased. After the death of his first wife he married defendant 2, Muthukannammal. Karuppanna, his father, died in 1912 and Perumal, his brother, died in 1910. Defendant 1 is the son of Perumal. It is not necessary to refer to the other defendants, for these are the principal parties concerned.

It would appear that, on the death of Krishnaswami Konar, his father and brother laid claim to the properties standing in his name as belonging to the joint family. They applied for succession certificate and defendant 2, the widow, apparently acquiesced at that time in their claim and made no objection to the grant of a certificate to Perumal. Then apparently she changed her mind not long afterwards, for we have got a number of notices, MM series, which she gave to the debtors of her husband; they were asked not to pay over outstandings to Perumal because he was making a fraudulent attempt to secure the moneys which did not belong to him. Thereafter the parties seem to have come to an amicable understanding, for a deed of maintenance was executed in 1909. Under that document the widow accepts Rs. 20 a month for her life as maintenance and also a right of residence in the family house. But again apparently she fell out with her husband's relations, for we find that Karuppanna, Perumal and defendant 1 instituted a suit, Original Suit No. 44 of 1910, for recovery of debts due under certain bonds in the name of Krishnaswami Konar, and in that suit defendant 2 filed a written statement alleging that the properties were the separate property of her deceased husband, being his self-acquisitions. Then apparently there was an attempt at mediation by common friends, with the result that a document, Ex. 18, called settlement Sridhanam deed, was executed under which Perumal assigned to the plaintiff and her deceased sister hypothecation bonds to the value of Rs. 2,300. This was on 28th May 1910. The suit was compromised by a razinamah petition Ex. 20. In that petition defendant 2 expressed herself as satisfied with receiving Rs. 3,200 cash in quit of all her claims to the property of her deceased husband.

A decree based on that petition, Ex. 21, was passed, the Court sanctioning the compromise on behalf of the minor defendant 3 (defendant 1 in this suit). The present plaintiff or her sister was not a party to that suit; and the Court's sanction was naturally not obtained on behalf of them, who were also minors at the time, for the compromise. It is the effect of Exs. 20 and 21 that we are mainly concerned with in this appeal. I might also mention another suit which was filed (Original Suit No. 3 of 1915) by defendant 1 seeking to set aside the settlement in favour of the plaintiff and her sister under Ex. 18. The plaintiff in this suit filed a written statement, Ex. GGI, contesting that suit. The contention on behalf of the appellant is that the compromise evidenced by Exs. 20 and 21 was in the nature of a family settlement arrived at by the widow and therefore binding on the plaintiff, the presumptive reversioner. No doubt the father and brother of Krishnaswami did make allegations that the properties standing in the name of Krishnaswami were joint family properties and that defendant 2 was a member of the joint family, and it may be taken that defendant 2, the widow of Krishnaswami, acquiesced in that allegation on several occasions and even accepted the allegation as true. But any such statement of hers cannot amount to an estoppel by which the plaintiff would be bound and it is not so contended. These various statements of defendant 2 have been referred to only as showing that there was a bona fide dispute and that the razinama was executed in settlement of that dispute. The most significant fact however is that in the very razinama petition all the properties are alleged by the parties as belonging to Krishnaswami himself and not as belonging to the joint family.

There is no allusion whatever either in Exs. 20 or 21 to any claim by Perumal or by Karuppannah that Krishnaswami was a member of the joint family, that the properties belonged to the joint family and that the parties were adjusting their disputes in the manner stated in Ex. 20. In Ex. 21 also, the decree, they, in more than one place, speak of the properties as belonging to the deceased husband of defendant 2. How came these documents to be drafted in that way it is impossible to tell, because no evidence has been brought to our notice which furnishes any explanation. In the face of those documents it is impossible to say that defendant 2 was adjusting a bona fide dispute in regard to the estate, and the facts which have already been mentioned show clearly that defendant 2 was not making any attempt to protect the interests of the reversioner. All that she was content with was a sum of Rs. 3,200, and for that amount she parted with all the properties of her husband amounting to about Rs. 20,000. These documents really are in the nature of an alienation purporting to be made by the widow of her husband's properties and not a settlement of a bona fide dispute as to the title of these properties. We have been referred to a ruling of the Privy Council on the subject of compromise by widows in Khunni Pal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (1). All that their Lordships lay down is to this effect :

> "that a compromise is based on the assumption that there was an antecedent title of some kind in the parties, and the agreement acknowledges and defines what that title is."

Such an agreement is altogether wanting in this case, for it proceeds on the assumption not that Karuppanna and Perumal had any title to those properties but that they belonged solely to defendant 2's deceased husband. Further, as pointed out by a Bench of this Court in a case reported as Muthukumarasami Odayar v. Subramania Iyer (2), a compromise effected by a widow, in order to be binding, must be shown to have been made with due care and caution :

> "When there is a litigation pending, the widow is also interested in the subject matter of the litigation and she must have a discretion as to how to conduct that litigation and to come to an arrangement with her opponent, if as a matter of fact she believed that it would be in the best interests of the estate. On the other hand, the reversioner is entitled to show that the compromise was not arrived at with due care and caution and was such as really showed negligence on the part of the widow."

In this case, as already stated, defendant 2 cannot be said to have taken any caution whatever to protect the interests of the reversioner. All the evidence points to the conclusion that she was from time to time acting either at the whim of the moment or at the advice of persons who happened to surround her at the time. I therefore agree in the conclusion arrived at by the Subordinate Judge on this point. Then Mr. T. V. Muthukrishna Ayyar appearing on behalf of the appellant argued that the finding that the family was divided and that these properties were the self-acquisitions of Krishnaswami is wrong. He did not in fact attempt to take us through the entire evidence in the case which has been fully dealt with by the Subordinate Judge, but he brought to our notice what apparently he thought was the most important evidence in favour of his client in this connexion and as we did not think that that evidence in the light of the admitted facts of the case showed that the family was joint and the properties in dispute were properties of the family, he did not think it would serve any useful purpose to go further into the matter. I shall assume that he has succeeded in showing that Ex. CC, which is a mortgage of the two houses for Rs. 3,000, alluded to two previous mortgages, Ex. BB and Z. The mortgage under Ex. Z for Rs. 1,000 purports to be in favour of Karuppanna, the father of Krishnaswami. But Ex. CC does not, as pointed out by the Subordinate Judge, say that part of the consideration was a previous mortgage in favour of Karuppanna.

Whether Ex. Z was a benami transaction or whether there is some other explanation forthcoming as to how that is included in Ex. CC, if that be a fact, we are not in a position to determine because no evidence has been given as to the circumstances under which Ex. CC was executed, and as to how it referred to Ex. Z even though it purported to be in favour of Karuppanna. It would be going much too far to say that these transactions showed that Krishnaswami was joint at their date with Karuppanna and Perumal. Krishnaswami admittedly left the family house in 1889, and he carried on separate business in contracts in his own name. A long list of documents which have been filed stand in his name alone. Similarly Karuppanna had a business in his own name and Perumal also was earning money and acquired properties separately. There cannot be any doubt whatever that the finding of the Subordinate Judge that Krishnaswami had separated from the family and all these properties were his self acquisitions is correct. The next question relates to the appointment of a receiver. The learned Subordinate Judge thought that in the circumstances disclosed the best thing for the parties was that there should be a receiver to collect the outstandings due to the estate of the deceased Krishnaswami. Defendant 2 parted with her interest in the properties as a widow in favour of Perumal and Karuppanna now represented by defendant 1. It is so held by the Subordinate Judge and although she is represented by a pleader in this appeal, she takes no objection to the finding of the Subordinate Judge to that effect. She therefore has no interest in safeguarding the estate of Krishnaswami. As the bulk of the property of the estate consists of outstandings, the Subordinate Judge was right in the circumstances to appoint a receiver. At the same time defendant 1, who, it may be pointed out, is still a minor though he will attain majority soon, is entitled to make the best use of the money which he is entitled to hold during the lifetime of defendant 2, and the learned pleader for defendant 1 has asked us therefore to modify the decree by directing that as soon as the receiver has collected a sum of Rs. 1,000 or thereabouts he should hand over the amount to defendant 1 on his (defendant 1's) furnishing security to the satisfaction of the Court after due notice to the plaintiff.

(1) [1911] 33 All. 356=38 I. A. 87 (P.C.).
(2) [1916] 33 I. C. 687.

This I think is reasonable. With that modification, the decree of the Subordinate Judge must be confirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs of the plaintiff. As regards the memorandum of objections, the first point urged by the learned pleader for the plaintiff was that as a matter of fact defendant 2 did not alienate her interest in the properties to Perumal and Karuppanna. Bu defendant 2 herself, though there is, as already pointed out, the decree against her so far as her interest is concerned, does not contest it and even in this Court her pleader is content with the decree. It is not open to the plaintiff to dispute this part of the judgment of the lower Court. The same answer applies to the second point urged in the memorandum of objections, namely that the suit comprised properties other than those set out in the schedule to Ex. 21, the decree on the compromise and therefore, at least with respect to those properties, defendant 1 has no right even during the lifetime of defendant 2. Defendant 2 in Ex. 20, the razinama, says that she has relinquished all her rights to the estate of her husband. As she does not raise any question before us as regards any item of the properties, the memorandum of objections must be dismissed with costs of defendant 1.

Spencer, J.—The plaintiff is the daughter and nearest heir of the deceased Krishnaswami Konar, who died in 1907. Defendant 2 is plaintiff's stepmother and Krishnaswami Konar's second wife. Plaintiff sued to obtain a declaration that the decree in Appeal Suit No 44 of 1910, on the file of the District Munsif of Trichinopoly, was not binding on the reversioner. The first point argued in appeal was that when defendant 2 entered into the compromise in Original Suit No. 44 of 1910, she represented the estate of her deceased husband and that the compromise shold be upheld as a bona fide settlement of family disputes and as binding on the plaintiff. I feel quite clear that the widow, defendant 2, did not represent any interests but her own when she entered into the compromise embodied in Exs. 20 and 21 in Original Suit No. 44 of 1910. What Muthukannammal got out of that arrangement was a lump sum of Rs. 3,200 in quit of all her claims on the estate of her deceased husband and a right of residence for her lifetime in a certain house. This she took "absolutely and for her sole and exclusive benefit," as stated in Ex. 20. If anyone represented the reversionary interest in that suit, it was rather the plaintiff in that suit, as may be seen from the words "that the plaintiffs or other reversionary heirs of the said Krishnaswami Konar be entitled to the house after her." Beyond the words "other reversionary heirs of the said Krishnaswami Konar," there is no indication that the future claim of the reversioners to Krishnaswami Konar's estate was even considered at the time; much less that steps were taken to protect the interest of those minors.

Although the leave of the Court was obtained under O. 32, R. 7, Civil P. C., for the present appellant Gangamirdham, who was then, as now, a minor, entering into that compromise, Rajamanikkathammal (plaintiff in this suit) and her sister Meenammal (now deceased) were not personally made parties to that suit and no similar permission was obtained on their behalf for compromising it, although they were then minors. It would be manifestly unjust to hold the plaintiff and her sister bound by the acts of their stepmother in that suit. On the other questions argued before us I have nothing to add to what my learned brother has said, and I agree in the order proposed by him.

Provincial Insolvency Act (3 of 1907), S 37—Transfer with fraudulent preference—Burden of proof is on receiver—Deliberate intention must be proved—Transfer will have such effect is not sufficient.

Where a transaction is impugned as amounting to fraudulent preference within the meaning of S. 37, Provincial Insolvency Act, the burden lies on the Receiver, or the creditors who impugn the transfer, to make out that the transfer was made with a view to give preference. It is not sufficient to prove that the transaction took place within three months of the insolvency, and that in fact it had the effect of giving preference to the transferee: it must be shown positively that the transfer was made with a view to prefer the creditor to whom the transfer was made, and unless such an intention is made out, the mere fact that the transfer would hav e such an effect is not sufficient to bring the case within the scope of the law. Judgment.—After the order of remand was made by this Court on 26th March 1918 giving an opportunity to the transferee, the transfer in whose favour is impeached in this case under S. 37, Provincial Insolvency Act, both the parties adduced evidence relevant to the matter and we have now got to decide on that evidence whether there is a case under S. 37. A ruling of this Court in Official Assignee of Madras v. Mehtha & Sons (1) and another of the Calcutta High Court in Nripendra Nath Sahu v. Ashutosh Ghose (2) lay down clearly after a full discussion of the authorities that it is for the Receiver, who is impugning a transaction as amounting to fraudulent preference within the meaning of S. 37, Provincial Insolvency Act, to prove the allegation. No doubt in the order of remand, the learned Judges seem to have taken the opposite view. This is a question of law and we agree with the decisions already mentioned. The facts of this case are that Nagalingam Pillai's creditors' petition to declare him insolvent was filed on 27th January 1914 and the transfer which is a deed of sale in favour of the appellant, one of the creditors, was made on 11th December 1913, that is within three months of the insolvency. The consideration for the sale was Rs. 1,000, out of which Rs. 500 was paid towards the debt due to the vendee himself and out of the balance Rs. 400 was paid to a relation of the respondent's witness 2 who had a mortgage on another property of the insolvent and Rs. 100 to another creditor who had a mortgage. These are practically all the facts we have before us, to find whether the case comes under S. 37.

The law lays down that it is not sufficient to prove that the transaction which is impugned took place within three months of the insolvency and that in fact it had the effect of giving preference to the transferee, but it has to be shown positively that the transfer was made with a view to prefer the creditor to whom the transfer was made. The burden lies, as pointed out in the decisions, on the receiver or the creditors who impugn the transfer to make out that the transfer was made with a view to give preference. Unless such intention is made out, the mere fact that the transfer would have such an effect is not sufficient to bring the case within the scope of the law. As we have suggested, beyond the fact that the transfer was made within three months prior to the insolvency and that it had the effect of paying the transferee in full, while the other creditors would probably receive much less than their debt, there is nothing on which we can hold that the transfer was made with the intention contemplated by law. It is not suggested that the consideration for the transfer was not the proper value of the property. The transferee it may be mentioned is not a relation of the insolvent, in which case the Court might be inclined to view the transfer with suspicion. And there is some evidence though it cannot be said to be of a very cogent character, that the transferee had been pressing for payment of his debts and that it was in pursuance of that demand the sale was effected. Under the circumstances we cannot uphold the view taken by the learned District Judge that the case fell within the purview of S. 37, Insolvency Act.

The learned pleader for the respondent before us suggested that his client was misled by the observation in the previous order of the High Court as to the burden of proof. But there is nothing to show that the respondent was in any way prevented from adducing any evidence either at the original trial or after remand. In fact after the order of remand, he did adduce some evidence and we do not think that we can entertain the suggestion that he would have adduced better evidence if he did not think that the burden lay on the other side. It was his duty to have adduced the best evidence he had, either to prove that the transaction amounted to fraudulent preference or to rebut the proof of the other side that the transfer was bona fide and made for valuable consideration. In the result we set aside the order of the District Judge and dismiss the petition with costs here and in the Court below.

Civil Appeal No. 420 of 1917, Decided on 29th January 1919, against decree of Sub-Judge, Kumbakonam, in Original Suit No. 2 of 1917.

Contract — Construction — Purchase by plaintiff from defendants 1 to 3 who had already purchased half-share from defendant 4 as guardian of P—Suit by P against plaintiff for recovery of her share—No application by defendant 4 for impleading him—Suit compromised by plaintiff by paying off P—Suit subsequently brought by plaintiff for refund of purchase money and for interest—Suit held maintainable—Cause of action held to arise on payment to P—Plaintiff held entitled to interest — Limitation Act (1908), Art. 97—T. P. Act (1882), S. 55 (2).

Plaintiff purchased certain properties from defendants 1 to 3 who had already purchased a half-share of these from defendant 4, as guardian of P. P filed a suit by her next friend to recover her share of the properties with mesne profits from the plaintiff. Defendant 4 not applying to be impleaded to defend his title, plaintiff compromised the suit with P by paying her Rs. 5,925 in settlement of her claim. Plaintiff brought the present suit for refund of the purchase-money as damages and for interest on the same from the date of his payment to P:

Held: (1) that the suit was maintainable as one for return of the purchase-money on failure of consideration: (2) that the cause of action arose on the date of plaintiff's payment to P and the suit was not barred: (3) that plaintiff was entitled to interest on the purchase-money. [P 38 C 1]

Judgment. — This is a suit for damages brought by the plaintiffs who purchased certain properties from defendants 1 to 3. Defendants 1 to 3 had purchased one-half share of these properties from defendant 4, the guardian of his minor daughter, Ponnammal, who had inherited them from her deceased mother. After Ponnammal's marriage a suit Original Suit No. 43 of 1915, was filed on her behalf to recover back her share of the properties with mesne profits from the present plaintiffs. The plaintiffs gave notice to defendant 4 to come in and defend the title, but he failed to do so and in these circumstances the plaintiffs, on 28th September 1916, consented to a decree by which they became liable to pay Ponnammal Rs. 5,925 in settlement of her claims, which sum they duly paid and then sued to recover the amount as damages from their vendors, defendants 1 to 3, and defendant 4 and his son, defendant 5.

At the trial the plaintiffs said they would be satisfied with the return by defendants 1 to 3 of the one-half of the purchase-money which was attributable to Ponnammal's half-share in the lands with interest at 6 per cent. and the Subordinate Judge has given judgment against them for this sum. The appellants object that the plaintiff's claim for damages for breach by defendants 1 to 3 of their covenant of title is barred as time ran from 1898, the date of the sale deed, Ex. B. For the plaintiffs it is argued that the suit must be regarded as instituted to recover damages for breach of a covenant to quiet enjoyment. There is no implied covenant for quiet enjoyment in a deed of sale, and the plaint does not allege that there was any such covenant in the sale deed, Ex. B, or base the suit upon it. In para. 10 of the plaint it is merely stated that

"since defendants 1 and 2 and their father, and defendant 3's father, the late Srinivasa Raghava Chariar, made plaintiff 1 believe that the plaint A schedule properties belonged to them undisputedly and sold the same to him and since the re-ponsibility of protecting the said properties and delivering them to the plaintiffs free of dispute lies upon them according to law, and since they are legally bound to discharge the encumbrance which was created upon them by the said Original Suit No. 43 of 1915, and since they have not so discharged it, they are liable to make good all the loss which has accrued to the plaintiffs."

This is more like a claim for breach of covenant of title and does not contain any averment of a covenant for quiet enjoyment nor was any issue framed as to whether Ex. B contains such a covenant, nor does any such contention appear to have been put forward at the trial. The suit would appear to have been treated by the Subordinate Judge at the suggestion of the plaintiffs, as a suit for return of the purchase-money as on a failure of consideration, which was not barred according to the decision in Subbaraya v. Rajagopala (1).

The appellants object that on this basis the plaintiffs ought not to have been allowed interest on the purchase-money for the years during which they were in possession and in receipt of rents and profits. They were however obliged to compromise Ponnammal's suit for recovery of possession and for mesne profits for Rs. 5,925 which is considerably more than the principal and interest awarded, and in these circumstances there does not appear to be any sufficient reason for depriving them of the interest on the purchase-money. The appeal is dismissed with costs of plaintiffs.

Second Appeal No. 189 of 1917, Decided on 1st March 1918.

Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), S. 11, Expl. 6—Suit for partition and for setting aside alienation—Co-heir made pro forma defendant along with alienee—Dismissal of suit on ground of limitation—In appeal decree for plaintiffs' share—Death of co-heir defendant pending appeal—Legal representatives not impleaded—No memorandum of objections—Assignment by heirs of co-heir of his share—Fresh suit by assignees for assignor's share—First Court's decree in prior suit held did not operate as res judicata as decision was reversed on appeal—Failure by co heir to file memo of objections did not affect question—Appeal Court's finding so far as decision in plaintiffs' favour was res judicata.

Plaintiffs, sons of a daughter of G, sued to recover their 2-3rds share in a property alienated by the widow of the last male holder. Both the alienee and another co-heir, R, the son of another daughter of G, were made parties. R claimed his 1-3rd share offering to pay court-fee thereon. The alienee pleaded limitation. The trial Court dismissed the plaintiffs' suit as barred. This decree was reversed on appeal and the plaintiffs were awarded their 2-3rds share. R, who was a party to the appeal, did not file a memorandum of objections. R died pending the disposal of the appeal and his legal representatives were not brought on the record. After the termination of the appeal R's heirs assigned R's share to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs filed the present suit against the alienee from the widow of the last male holder. The defendant pleaded that as R did not file a memorandum of objection in the appellate Court the decision of the first Court on the question of limitation operated as a bar by res judicata to the present suit:

Held: (1) that the claim was not barred as res judicata as the decision of the first Court was reversed on appeal and there was no subsisting decision of the former on the question of limitation to operate as a bar to the plaintiffs' suit;

(2) that the failure of R to file a memorandum of objections in the prior case did not affect the question as the plaintiffs who did appeal raised the very question in which he was interested;

H. Balakrishna Row—for Appellants.

Abdur Rahim, J.—This was a suit to set aside an alienation. There were two brothers, Gopala Aiya and Govinda Aiya. The plaintiffs are sons of a daughter of Gopala Aiya They were also assignees of the property in dispute from the legal representatives of Ramchandra Aiya, the son of the other daughter of Gopala Aiya. Both the plaintiff and Ramchandra Aiya were entitled to the reversion. The present plaintiffs instituted Original Suit No. 58 of 1910 to recover 2/3rds of their share from an alienee of the widow of the last male holder who was in possession. To that suit Ramchandra Aiya was made a party defendant. The suit was one for partition, but the person in possession claiming an independent right, was also made a party. Defendant 11 in that suit, that is, Ramchandra Aiya, supported the plaintiffs' case and said that he was also entitled to 1/3rd share in the property and expressed his willingness to pay the necessary court-fee and asked that a decree might be passed in his favour. The District Munsif however did not make him a plaintiff as he ought to have done; but an issue was raised as to whether he was entitled to 1/3rd share as claimed by him.

The real question for trial was common both to the plaintiffs and defendant 11. One of the pleas of the contesting defendants was limitation and that turned upon the question who died first —Gopala Aiya or Govinda Aiya. The District Munsif, finding that Gopala Aiya died first, held that the suit, that is No. 58 of 1910, was barred. The plaintiffs appealed from that decree and the appellate Court decided in favour of the plaintiffs, holding that Govinda Aiya was the surviving brothers and the suit was not barred. He gave the plaintiffs a decree for 2/3rd share claimed by them. Pending the appeal, Ramchandra Aiya, defendant 11, had died and his legal representatives were not brought on the record. His legal representatives afterwards assigned Ramchandra Aiya's share to the plaintiffs in this suit, who were also reversioners to the property in their own right, and the present suit is for the recovery of that share. One of the issues framed in this suit was whether the judgment of the District Munsif on the question of limitation in the previous litigation did not bar the suit. Both the Courts have held that it did. I am of opinion that this is a wrong view of the law. The decree of the Munsif was reversed by the lower appellate Court and so was the finding on which the decree was based. It is difficult for me to understand how the finding of the Munsif on the issue of limitation could be held to operate as a bar to the plaintiffs' present suit when that finding was reversed by the appellate Court. It is true that defendant 11 did not either appeal or file a memorandum of objections. But it was not necessary for him to do so when the plaintiffs who did appeal raised the very question in which defendant 11 was interested. He was made a party to the appeal and the appellate Court reversed not only the decree, but the finding of the Munsif on the question of limitation.

The effect of that must be that not only there was no decree of the District Munsif but also there was no subsisting decision of his on the question of limitation to operate as a bar to the plaintiffs' suit. Then in this connexion, a further question was raised that even if the finding of the Munsif in the previous suit on the question of limitation still held good so far as Ramachandra Aiya, defendant 11, or his successor-in-title is concerned, whether the judgment of a Full Bench of this Court in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (1) would not apply. That was a case somewhat similar to the present. The suit was by a co owner to recover his share of the property and there also the trespasser was made a party to the suit. It was ruled that S 13, Expl. 5, Civil P. C. 1882, which corresponds to S. 11, Expl. 6 of the present Code, did apply so as to make the judgment in the previous litigation as against one co-owner seeking to recover property res judicata against another co-owner who was made a defendant. The ground on which the decision was based was that the relief claimed in the one suit was not the same as that claimed in the other. In that case the word "right" in S 13 was interpreted as being synonymous with the actual relief sought by the plaintiff, that is to say, his share of the property. The suit in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (1) was also framed as a suit for partition, but it appears that the Court then gave only a decree for the share of the plaintiffs. That would be a good ground for distinguishing the present case from the case before the Full Bench. As however the decision of the Munsif in Original Suit No. 58 of 1910 was reversed by the appellate Court, it could not be held that that decision operated as res judicata against the plaintiffs' claim. On the other hand, the question arises, upon the facts already stated, whether the finding of the appellate Court in the previous litigation would not be res judicata in favour of the plaintiffs. No doubt this question was not raised by the appellants, but what the effect of the previous litigation was had been put in issue and we have got all the facts before us in this connexion. The appellate Court in Original Suit No. 58 held that the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree for partition in respect of their share, that is to say, for 2/3rds. Its finding that Govinda Aiya was the survivor and the suit was not barred must have the effect of debarring the same question being raised again. I am therefore of opinion that the final judgment in Original Suit No. 58 of 1910 is res judicata so far as the question decided by it is concerned in favour of the plaintiffs. The result will be that the judgment of the lower Courts be set aside and the suit remanded to the District Munsif to be tried on the other issues arising in the case. Costs will abide the result.

Napier, J.—My learned brother has stated the facts of the case both in this and in the previous litigation, and it is not necessary for me to recapitulate them. In the present suit, defendant 2 raised the plea that the judgment of the District Munsif in Original Suit No. 58 of 1910, finding on the facts as to the date of the death of the parties, on which finding he held that the suit was barred by limitation must be taken to be a decision which will bind the plaintiffs in this suit because their predecessor in title, defendant 11, did not appeal against that decision and therefore he was not entitled to the benefit of the decision of the Court of appeal in that suit. In consequence of that plea, the Court framed an issue:

"Whether the suit is barred by reason of the decision in Original Suit No. 58 of 1910, on appeal, Appeal Suit No. 281 of 1911, and on Second Appeal No 2143 of 1913."

Mr. Balakrishna Row has contended here that the matter is not res judicata by virtue of that decision of the District Munsif, and he has relied on the decision of the Full Bench in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (1). That was a suit in which the plaintiff sued for partition and recover possession of his share from defendant 1, who denied that defendant 5 was a reversioner and set up his own title. The matter was referred to the Full Bench and the Full Bench gave the opinion based on the form of the decree, which was that there should be no decree for partition but only a decree for a particular share, and in that view held that as the defendant who was sought to be held bound by that decree was not a person entitled to share in the relief given to the plaintiff, Expl. 6, S 11, Civil P. C., did not apply, the words being:

"where persons litigate bona fide in respect of a public right or of a private right claimed in common for themselves and others."

The view taken by the Full Bench, which is of course binding upon us, is expressed in the opinion on p. 465 of 28 Mad. that

"Defendant 5. in the present suit is not interested in the relief that may be granted to the plaintiffs in the first suit. The conduct of the suit was not in his hands and with reference to the share of the plaintiffs in that suit he could not have been made a co-plaintiff. He gets no advantage therefore from that suit. He cannot enforce any rights of his own under that decree."

Mr. Yegnanarayana Adiga has contended that this case can be distinguished on two grounds. First that there was in this suit a decree for partition. In the prior suit, the decree was for a partition. That appears from the papers in that case. On p. 36 of the papers in Second Appeal No. 2143 of 1913 the decree is set out containing this clause:

"That the plaint item No. 2 hereunder described be divided by metes and bounds into three equal shares, having regard to the good and bad soil, and two shares out of them be made over to the plaintiffs for their shares; that defendant 3 do pay 2/3rds of the past mesne profits, etc."

He further contends that the Full Bench case is not applicable where there is in fact an active contest between the defendant who is sought to be bound by that decree and the other co-defendants; and he points out that there is nothing in the judgment in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (1) to show that their Lordships intended to apply the reasoning in their judgment to such a case. With regard to the first ground, bearing in mind the language which I have referred to, especially the words

"he is not interested in the relief that may be granted; he gets no advantage from that suit; he cannot enforce any rights of his own under that decree."

I am satisfied that the distinction is sound and that the decision of the Full Bench will not affect this case. With regard to the other contention, it is true that what the Full Bench were doing was the construing of the language of what is now Expl. (6) to S. 11, namely, the words "litigate bona fide in respect of a private right claimed in common for themselves and others." They did not purport to be construing the language of S. 11, namely:

"where the matter has been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit between the same parties."

Therefore the decision does not affect such a case. That is the view taken in Ramaswamy Reddi v. Abhoy Chetty (2). There the language is:

"The decision in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (1) is inapplicable (though it is written applicable in the report) to this case, as there was no active controversy between the co-defendant there."

In my opinion that case was rightly decided and I would follow it. The defendant is entitled to say that the decision in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (1) does not stand in the way of his plea of res judicata. But although that is so, it seems to me, and I agree with my learned brother in that view, that the appellant has taken a wrong line in the presentation of his case to this Court and that he should have argued that the decision of the District Munsif in Original Suit No. 58 of 1910 is not a bar to him, because the judgment and decree in that case had been set aside and the appellate Court had arrived at opposite findings and substituted another decree. There can be no question of one thing, namely, that the decree in neither the suit nor the appeal has any bearing on the subject whatsoever, because it does not mention the rights of the person who was then defendant 11 in that suit. It is only the finding on the issue of fact or law which can operate as res judicata, and as my learned brother has pointed cut, the facts found and the inference of law arrived at on these facts by the District Munsif have been negatived by the findings of the appellate Court. This is of course not a case where there have been several judgments or a single judgment in several suits and some of these suits had not been appealed from; in such a case, of course, the finding still remains because the decision in the suit remains. But here we have a case where there has been an appeal and defendant 11 was a party to that appeal, and in that appeal the findings and inference of law arrived at on those findings by the District Munsif have been negatived. It seems to me to follow therefore that there cannot remain any finding of the District Munsif on the question of law or fact which will bind defendant 11. That disposes of the plea of res judicata raised by the defendant as if founded on the judgment of the District Munsif. There then remains the question whether it is necessary for us to give leave to the plaintiff to amend his suit and frame a further issue as to whether the finding of the appellate Court does not operate as res judicata in favour of the plaintiffs.

I agree with my learned brother that there is no necessity to do that. The question of res judicata was brought for decision by defendant 2, and the issue in fact names both the decisions of the District Munsif and that of the Court of appeal and this Court in second appeal. I agree with my learned brother that the findings of the appellate Court in that suit are res judicata in favour of the plaintiffs and that therefore on a preliminary issue as to the question of res judicata there must be a decision that those findings govern the case of the plaintiffs and that they are binding on the Court in respect of the case of the plaintiffs. The question having been raised on a preliminary issue there may be other issues which will arise on the proceedings, and these the first Court will dispose of in the light of the observations which we have made on the subject of res judicata. I agree with the order proposed by my learned brother.

Order.—The petitioner has been convicted under S. 16, Motor Vehicles Act, for having left his car without a light contrary to R. 16-A, Madras Motor Vehicle Rules. R. 16-A states that no person may cause or permit a mortor vehicle to stand or be used in a public place between half an hour after sunset or half an hour before sunrise unless it carries lights burning as stated in the rule. Before the owner of a motor vehicle can be covicted for an offence under this rule it must be shown that he caused or permitted the car to stand without lights burning. As pointed out by the Punjab Chief Court in Sohan Singh v. Emperor (1) rules cannot apply to an absent owner. There is no evidence that the accused knew that the car had no lights burning or permitted it to stand without lights. The evidence is that he purchased and put oil lights on the car and that his chauffeur was also given carbide. He was not in the car or so near it as to be aware that the lamps were not lighted.

Appeal No. 68 of 1918, Decided on 20th November 1918, against order of Dist. Judge, Cuddapah, in Execution Petn. No. 35 of 1916.

(a) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), O. 22, R. 4—Suit for partition—Preliminary decree—Death of defendant—Application for bringing legal representatives and for division and allotment of property — Legal representatives brought on record—Transfer of case for execution treating other prayers as prayers in execution — Transfer held illegal—Application was in substance to pass final decree.

After a preliminary decree for partition was passed by the District Court at Cuddapah defendant 1 died. The plaintiff filed an application for bringing his representatives on to the record, for the appointment of a Commissioner to divide the properties into six shares, and for delivery of one such share to herself. The District Judge brought defendants 8 to 10 on to the record as defendant 1's legal representatives, but treated the other prayers as prayers in execution and transferred the execution to the District Court at North Arcot:

Held: (1) that as the Cuddapah District Court had jurisduction under the law to continue the further trial of the suit, which must be considered as pending in that Court till a final decree was passed, the order of transfer to the District Court of North Arcot was illegal;

(2) that the plaintiff's application was in substance not an application for execution, but an application in the suit to pass a final decree. [P 43 C 1]

(b) Practice—New plea—Legal representatives brought on record—Objection on score of limitation cannot be raised in second appeal.

Where an application to bring the legal representatives of a deceased party on to the record is granted by a trial Court without any objection being taken thereto on the ground of limitation, an objection that the suit had abated by the application not having been made within the prescribed period, cannot be entertained in second appeal. [P 43 C 1]

(c) Hindu Law—Partition—Suit for—Preliminary decree against father — Death of father—His sons can be brought on record as legal representatives—Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), O. 22, R. 4.

Where a preliminary decree is passed against a Hindu father for partition, it is presumably passed against him as representing his undivided family and binds his sons, and on his death the plaintiff is entitled to add his sons as his legal representatives or even as parties whose names should be deemed to be already on the record as represented by their father till his death and which names are merely sought to be inscribed on the record openly after his death. Judgment.—Defendants 8 to 10 (the sons of the deceased defendant 1) are the appellants before us. A preliminary decree for partition of Sch. B properties was passed by the District Court, Cuddapah, in the plaintiff's favour against defendant 1 in 1904. Defendant 1 died in January or February 1914. The plaintiff filed the present petition on 8th December 1916 in the form of an execution petition and she filed it in the District Court of Cuddapah praying for defendants 8 to 10 being brought on the record as defendant 1's legal representatives, for the appointment of a Commissioner to divide Sch. B properties into six shares and for delivery of one such share to her. The District Court has brought defendants 8 to 10 on the record as defendant 1's legal representatives (evidently because no objection was taken by them to that course). But it treated the other prayers in execution and transferred the execution to the North Arcot District Court. The appellants contend before us that:

Ground No. 2: The appellants not having been made parties to the suit cannot be proceeded against in execution. Ground No. 3: The Court below erred in treating the application as a proceeding in execution. Ground No. 4: The legal representatives of the deceased not having been brought on the record within the time limited by law the District Judge ought to have held the suit as against him had abated. Ground No. 6: The lower Court has failed to note that the High Court expressly treated the decree as a preliminary decree to be followed up by a final decree, which alone is capable of execution. Ground No. 8: The District Judge ought to have held that the application was barred by limitation. Ground No. 10: The Court below had no jurisdiction to transfer the decree for execution to the District Court of North Arcot.

So far as grounds Nos. 3, 6 and 10 are concerned, the appellants' contentions are sustainable and the order of the District Judge of Cuddapan transferring execution to the District Court of North Arcot must be and is set aside. It must be admitted that the judgment of the High Court in A. A. O. No. 252 of 1912 is not quite clear on the question whether the District Court of North Arcot had exclusive jurisdiction over the further proceedings in the suit but that judgment, in our opinion, did not intend to deprive the Cuddapah District Court of its undoubted jurisdiction under the law to continue the further trial of the suit, which must be considered as pending in that Court till a final decree is passed in the suit. Ground No. 8 is unsustainable, as the petition is in substance not an execution petition but an application in a suit to pass a final decree and as such is not affected by the bar of limitation Too great a stress should not be laid on the from of the petition. As regards ground No 4, the contention that the suit had abated by an application not having been made within six months of defendant 1's death was not raised or argued in the lower Court and defendants 8 to 10, the appellants, were brought on the record of the suit without such an objection having been raised on their part. It is too late to raise the objection now and even if it is not too late, the plaintiff having filed a similar application (to bring on the record the legal representatives of defendant 1) in March 1915 in the North Arcot District Court and it appearing to us that the judgment of this Court in the previous proceeding between these same parties might have misled the plaintiff into the impression that applications as in execution proceedings could be taken by her once in three years and that they may be made to the District Court of North Arcot, we consider that the delay in filing the present application in the District Court of Cuddapah to bring in defendants 8 to 10 as the legal representatives of defendant 1 might be excused and we excuse it accordingly.

As regards ground No. 2 when a preliminary decree is passed against a Hindu father for partition, it is presumably passed against him as represnting his undivided family and binds his sons, and on his death the plaintiff is entitled to add his sons as his legal representatives or even as parties whose names should be already on the records as represented by deemed to be their father till his death and which names are merely sought to be inscribed on the records openly after his death. [See also Hira Lal Sahu v. Parmeshar Rai (1)] In the result we modifiy the lower Court's order by setting aside the direction transferring the decree for execution to the North Arcot District Court and direct the Cuddapah District Court to treat the application of the plaintiff, not as one in execution but as one in the pending suit itself, to pass a final decree after appointment of a commissioner, &c., and to pass fresh orders accordingly. We need not say that the commissioner appointed under O. 26, R. 14, may be a resident within the jurisdiction of the North Arcot District Court, if the District Court of Cuddapah thinks it desirable or convenient to appoint such a person. There will be no order as to the costs of this appeal.

Judgment. — The Subordinate Judge was wrong in holding that the previous decision of this Court dispcsed of issue 1. The first part of the latter runs thus:

"Whether Nachiappa Chetty and defendant 8 executed plaint promissory note and received consideration from plaintiff:"

and the question of whether the promissory note was supported by consideration was not considered at all by the learned Judges. We must therefore call for a finding cn the evidence on record on the question of whether the plaint promissory note was or was not supported by consideration. The finding should be submitted in two months from this date, and seven days will be allowed for filing objections.

The trial Court submitted his finding that no consideration was paid by the plaintiff and that therefore nothing was due to him thereunder.

Judgment.—This case has come up to this Court more than once and has given rise to differing comments on the wording of the judgments cf this Court. It is therefore desirable to state once again the facts of the case, so that there may be no occasion for further misunderstanding. The plaintiff sued on a promissory note standing in his name. His case was that he paid money for the note. The executants were one Nachiappa Chetty who, it was alleged, was the agent of the firm of which defendants 1 to 5 were said to be the partners, and defendant 8 who it was alleged, was the agent and partner of a firm of which defendants 6 to 10 were the partners. Defendants 1 to 5 stated that no money came from the plaintiff and that the real lender was defendant 8, between whose firm and the firm of defendants 1 to 5 the loan was adjusted. In this state of the pleadings, the first issue was raised which in substance involved the decision of two questions, (a) whether plaintiff advanced the money and was consequently entitled to sue and (b) if not, whether the plaintiff being a benamidar for defendant 8 was entitled to maintain the suit. On the first occasion the Subordinate Judge held that plaintiff being a name-lender was not entitled to maintain the suit. He also found that there was an endorsement to defendant 8 by the plaintiff, and that the note went out of the possession of the plaintiff. Sankaran Nair and Oldfield, JJ., who heard the appeal on the first occasion held that the note had left the hands of the plaintiff. On the question of the plaintiff's right of suit, they held that although he may only be a benamidar, his right of suit was not lost. The case was remanded to the Subordinate Judge.

On this second occasion, the Subordinate Judge held that the question of the payment of consideration by the plaintiff was res judicata by virtue of the decision of Sankaran Nair and Oldfield, JJ. We heard the appeal from this latter judgment of the Subordinate Judge. We disagreed with him on the question of res judicata and remanded the suit for trial. In our judgment we stated the issue in these terms:

"Whether the plaint promissory note was or was not supported by consideration."

But it is clear from the previous portion of our judgment that we did not intend to vary the issue originally framed; and we stated specifically that the trial of the first part of the first issue originally framed was not barred by res judicata. On the present occasion, the Subordinate Judge has come to the conclusion that plaintiff paid no portion of the consideration. Mr. Anantakrishna Aiyar does not seriously attack this finding, and we think the Subordinate Judge's decision is borne out by the evidence on the record. What the learned vakil for the plaintiff urges is that even though the money might have belonged to defendant 8, so long as the plaintiff is the holder of the note, he is entitled to sue for its recovery. We are unable to agree with him. The defendant 8 who is the real promisee is himself a co-promisor. If the note had been executed to defendant 8 by himself and by Nachiappa Chetty, defendant 8 would not have been entitled to maintain a suit. No authority to the contrary has been cited to us. The definition of the term "consideration" excludes the idea that a promisor can also be the promisee. Mr. Anantakrishna Aiyar's suggestion that defendant 8 was different from the firm which was the promisor has not been raised or tried hitherto and we cannot allow that question to be argued. If defendant 8 as promisee of a note of which he is the promisor cannot maintain a suit, it also follows that the plaintiff who is his benamidar cannot maintain the suit. A benamidar cannot be in a better position than the real owner. In this view, the suit brought by the plaintiff must be dismissed with costs. In the result we accept the finding of the Subordinate Judge, allow Appeals Nos. 112 and 150 of 1916 and dismiss the suit with costs against the plaintiff throughout, subject to plaintiff's right to recover costs awarded to him in Appeal No. 349 of 1912. The memorandum of objections is dismissed without costs. The appellants in Appeal No. 112 of 1916 must pay the costs of respondents 2 to 4.

Judgment.—On the authority of the decisions in Jibuniti Nath Khan v. Shib Nath Chuckerbutty (1), Bandey Ali v. Gokul Misir (2) and Siliman Sahib v. Buntala Haman (3) we have no hesitation in holding that the lower Courts were right in thinking that the present suit for a declaration of the plaintiff's title coupled with a prayer for possession is not barred under O. 2, R. 2, by reason of the plaintiff's previous suit, which was for a declaration of title and for an injunction against disturbance, having been dismissed through his failure to prove possession. The case in Naganada Iyer v. Krishnamurti Aiyar (4) is distinguishable on the ground that there the previous suit was dismissed for default which involved a finding of all the issues against the plaintiff. The question of res judicata upon which that case was decided does not arise for decision against the plaintiff in this case, as in both suits here the plaintiff succeeded on the issue as to the character of the sale-deeds. The Second Appeal No. 2123 of 1915 fails and is dismissed with costs. A further question has been raised in Second Appeal No. 2122 of 1915, namely, whether Original Suit No. 249 of 1911 was properly instituted on a cause of action which was in the previous litigation combined with that which formed the basis of Original Suit No. 183 of 1911. This point was not raised at the trial in the Courts below and we cannot allow it to be argued at this stage. This second appeal is also dismissed with costs.

Criminal Revn. No. 583 of 1918, and Criminal Revn. Petn. No. 471 of 1918, Decided on 16th January 1919, from order of Sess. Judge, Guntur, D/- 15th July 1918 in Criminal Revn. Petition. No. 10 1918.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S 436 — Direction by Sessions Court to commit accused to Sessions for offence under S. 471 of Penal Code is not legal.

A direction by a Court of Session to a Magistrate to commit an accused person to the Sessions for an offence under S. 471, Penal Code, is beyond its power under S. 436, Criminal P. C. as the offence is not exclusively triable by the Sessions Court. [P 46 C 2]

(b) Penal Code (1860), S. 193 — Deposition not read over to witness and not acknowledged as correct—Omission is not mere irregularity—Conviction under S. 193 is not sustainable.

A conviction under S. 193, Penal Code, is not sustainable where the deposition after it had been completed was not read over to the witness and acknowledged by him to be correct. The omission is more than an irregularity and it is dangerous and against public policy to make a witness liable on an unsafe record: 45 I. C. 507, not Appr. [P 47 C 1]

(c) Criminal Trial—Evidence—Depositions.

(d) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 239 — S. 239 does not prohibit preliminary inquiry for commitment to Sessions.

Section 239 only prohibits a joint trial and not a joint preliminary inquiry for the purpose of commitment to the Sessions. [P 47 C 1]

P. Chenhiah —for Petitioners.

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The petitioners in revision are the four accused in P. R. C. No. 4 of 1918 on the file of the Stationary 2nd Class Magistrate, Ongole. An inquiry for the purpose of commitment or discharge, as the case may be was made in this case by the said Stationary 2nd Class Magistrate, the complaint against accused 1 being under two Ss. 471 and 193, I. P. C. and against the other accused under S. 193, I. P. C. alone. The charge under S. 193 relates to the depositions Exs. K, L, M and N, given by accused 4 before the District Munsif of Ongole in Original Suit No. 47 of 1913, to the effect that the complainant executed a promissory note for Rs. 500 in favour of accused 1's father. The Stationary Sub-Magistrate discharged all the accused under S. 209, Criminal P. C. He considered that Exs. K, L, M and N were not admissible in evidence as the legally correct record of the statements given by the accused in the Ongole District Munsif's Court's suit because it appeared from the evidence of the Trial Clerk (P. W. 3) of the District Munsif's Court that the depositions after they were completed were not interpreted and read over to the witnesses as required by O. 18, Rr. 5 and 6, Civil P. C. He also held that the statements could not be proved by the other evidence except these records (Exs. K, L, M and N) under S. 91, Evidence Act. This is the ground on which the Stationary Sub-Magistrate based the discharge of the accused so far as the offence under S. 193, I. P. C. was concerned. As regards the offence under S. 471, I. P. C. against accused 1 alone the Magistrate's reasons are not quite clear except that the depositions (Exs. K, L, M and N) cannot be used to connect accused 1 with the forged document Ex. A.

Against the order of discharge a petition under Ss. 435 and 437, Criminal P. C. seems to have been presented to the Sessions Judge and the learned Judge set aside the order of discharge and passed an order containing two directions, the first being that the case against accused 1 should be committed to the Sessions Court by the Sub-Magistrate in order that accused 1 may be tried for the offence under Ss. 471 and 193, I. P. C. and the second direction being that as regards accused 2, 3 and 4, the District Magistrate of Guntur should direct either the Joint Magistrate of Ongole or any other Magistrate he thinks fit to make a further inquiry into the complaints against these persons and try them as separate cases and dispose of them according to law. I must say that the learned Sessions Judge's first direction out of the two directions found in his order is not warranted by the powers exercisable by him under the provisions of S. 435 or S. 436, Criminal P. C. The offence under S. 193, I. P. C. is not exclusively triable by the Court of Session. The offence under S. 471, I. P. C. is also not exclusively triable by the Court of Session, unless the forged document is a promissory note of the Government of India. The Criminal Procedure Code (S. 436) gives the Sessions Judge power only to call for and examine records. S. 436 gives him power to order commitment only when the offence is exclusively triable by the Sessions Court. The Sessions Judge's order therefore directing accused to be committed to his Court is illegal and must be set aside. As regards the charge under S. 193, I. P. C., against all the accused there is a case not officially reported but mentioned in Meango v. Baviah (1), which goes to the length of holding that even serious irregularities in making the record of the depositions of witnesses do not render that record inadmissible in evidence to prove the statement so recorded and only go in mitigation of the weight to be attached to that record as accurate. I am not prepared to agree to that extent.

Where a deposition after it has been completed has been interpreted and read over to the witness and acknowledged by him to be correct any irregularity due to the omission of the observances of further formalities such as the presence of the Judge and his listening to the reading during the time when the deposition is interpreted and read over to the witness may not affect the admissibility of the record as evidence of the witness's statement: see Bogra, In re (2). But the omission to interpret and read over the deposition to the witness after the deposition is completed cannot in my opinion be put on the same footing because the guarantee provided by the law for the accurancy of the deposition has been substantially ignored and it is dangerous and against public policy to make a witness liable on such a wholly unsafe record. I would therefore set aside the Sessions Judge's order so far as it directs the District Magistrate to make further inquiry in respect of the charge under S. 193, I. P. C.

I may add that the Sessions Judge fell into another error in holding that the Sub-Magistrate contravened the provisions of S. 239, Criminal P. C. in enquiring into the cases of these four accused jointly. S. 239 prohibiting only a joint trial and not a joint preliminary inquiry into a case for the purpose of commitment to the Session. Though the Sessions Judge's order as against accused 1 must be set aside as illegal, I think that this is a case in which the powers of this Court under S. 439, Criminal P. C. might properly be utilized for passing the necessary order in connexion with the alleged forging of the promissory note for Rs. 500 in the interests of justice. There was some evidence before the Sub-Magistrate that accused 1 did use the document as genuine in a Court of Justice and that the document is a forgery. The proper course for the Sub-Magistrate under those circumstances was to have committed accused 1 to the Sessions Court as regards the offence under S. 471, I. P. C. I would therefore direct him to do so.

Napier, J.--I agree. I would add that I am strongly influenced in the view I take as to the admissibility of the Exs. K, L, M and N, which have clearly been recorded in an irregular manner, by the provisions of S. 91, Evidence Act, which seem to lay down that the deposition is the only evidence admissible of the statements alleged to have been made by the witness. The words are:

"In all cases in which any matter is required by law to be reduced to the form of a document no evidence shall be given in proof of such matter except the document itself or secondary evidence of it."

It seems to me that where the legislature has imposed so narrow limits on methods of proof we should be careful to see that this sole proof is forthcoming in a form which is free from suspicion and I entirely agree with my learned brother that where the ground of the attack goes to the knowledge of the witness as to what has been recorded as his statement we have not got that certainty of accuracy which the law must require under S. 91, Evidence Act. I agree with the order proposed by my learned brother.

Secy. of State—Defendant—Appellant.

Sami Chettiar—Plaintiff—Respondent.

Civil Misc. Appeal No. 379 of 1917 Decided on 12th July 1918, against order of Temporary Sub-Judge, Tanjore, D/- 31st March 1917, in A. S. No. 12 of 1917.

(a) Madras Land Encroachment Act (1905), S. 14—S. 14 provides period of 6 months limitation for all suits coming within purview of 1st part—Tenant in occupation evicted and cattle shed demolished by Revenue authorities—Landlord suing for possession after notice to Collector—Landlord is "person deeming himself aggrieved"—His suit if brought after six months is barred.

The effect of S. 14 is to substitute a period of 6 months for the various periods provided in the Limitation Act for all suits which come within the purview of the first part of the section. [P 48 C 2]

Where a tenant in occupation of land was evicted in proceedings under the Madras Land Encroachment Act and a cattle-shed thereon was demolished by the Revenue Authorities, and the landlord, in assertion of his right, sued for possession after notice to the Collector:

Held: (1) that the plaintiff was a person deeming himself aggrieved' within the meaning of S. 14 of the Act; (2) that the suit was barred having been brought more than six months after the eviction.

Per Krishnan, J.—It is not necessary that the plaintiff should say in so many words in his plaint that he has been aggrieved, but if the effect of his allegations shows that he considers himself aggrieved by the action of the authorities, he is the person who will come within the words' "deeming himself aggrieved" within the meaning of S. 14. An amendment of title made to show that the eviction proceedings were illegal cannot be taken as necessarily showing that the suit is for vindication of title, nor does it take the plaintiff out of the category of "persons deeming themselves aggrieved." [P.49 C 1]

(b) Madras Land Encroachment Act (1905), S. 14—S. 14 includes claims for recovery of possession.

The wording of S. 14 is wide enough to include a claim for recovery of possession, which is one of the ways of redressing a person who has been wrongly evicted. [P 49 C 1]

(c) Madras Land Encroachment Act (1905), S. 14—Person though not party to proceedings resulting in eviction, his rights may be invaded in actual eviction.

Though a man may not be a party to the proceedings resulting in the order of eviction, and, therefore not affected by it, his reghts may be subsequently invaded by the actual eviction itself and thereby he may become a person aggrieved. [P 49 C 2]

K. Ramesam—for Appellant.

K. Narasimha Aiyangar—for Respondent.

Krishnan, J.—In this case plaintiff sues to recover from the defendant, the Secretary of State for India in Council, a small plot of land in the village of Thuhili with Rs. 35 as damages for the demolition of a cattle-shed on it. In his plaint he alleges that the land in question belongs to him, that in any event he has acquired a title to it by adverse possession for over 60 years, that he had leased it out to his tenant, one Appaswamy Chetty, and that while it was in the latter's possession, the Collector of Tanjore issued notice to his tenant under Madras Act 3 of 1905 and evicted him, wrongly treating the land as Government property, and that the defendant's Revenue Inspector demolished the cattle-shed on it which also belonged to plaintiff. He asserts that these proceedings are not valid and binding on him and seeks to recover possession of the land with damages as above stated. He puts his cause of action as arising in June 1914 on the date of eviction and states that even if the period of limitation prescribed by S. 14, Act 3 of 1905, be held applicable, his suit is saved by the fact that the final orders on his petition to the Collector were only passed in July 1915, the suit being within six months of that date. The defendant, among other pleas, raised the plea that the suit was barred by limitation. The District Munsif upheld this plea and dismissed the suit without trial on the merits, as under S. 14 the cause of action arises on the date of eviction, the final orders of the Collector not affecting the question. On appeal, however the Sub-Judge reversed that decision, holding that the general law of limitation applied to the case and not the rule laid down in S. 14, and remanded the case for trial on the merits. It is against that order that the defendant has appealed to us. The Government Pleader contends for him that the six months' rule in S. 14 applies and that the suit should be dismissed as barred by limitation. It is not denied that the suit must fail, if the rule applies. The question for decision therefore is whether the special rule in S. 14, Act 3 of 1905, or the general law of limitation applies to this case.

Section 14 provides that nothing in that Act should be held to prevent persons deeming themselves aggrieved by proceeding under the Act, except as provided in it, from applying to the Civil Courts for redress. The Act thus preserves the right of such persons under the general law of the country to sue in the ordinary civil Courts to enforce their rights which have been invaded by such proceedings. But under the 2nd part of the section such suits are subjected to the limitation of 6 months from the date of cause of action and this term is explained, in the case of eviction, to be the date of eviction. The effect of this section is thus to substitute a period of 6 months for the various periods provided in the Limitation Act for all suits which come within the provisions of the 1st part of it. From a perusal of the allegation in the plaint there can be no doubt that the plaintiff's case is that the eviction proceedings and the demolition of his shed were wrongs done to him under the Act, and he asks for redress of these wrongs by possession of the property being returned to him and by compensation being paid to him for the destroyed buildings. The case therefore seems to fall exactly within the scope of the section. The Sub-Judge has taken the view that though the plaintiff may be a person actually aggrieved by the proceedings under the Act, he should still not be considered to be a person "deeming himself so aggrieved," those being the words of the section; because, in his opinion, plaintiff has nowhere expressly admitted it in his plaint; he holds that the present suit is one "brought to vindicate plaintiff's general title." I am quite unable to accept this view. It is not necessary that plaintiff should say in so many words in his plaint that he has been aggrieved but if the effect of the allegations he makes shows that he considers himself aggrieved by the action of the Collector, he is the person who will come within the words "a person deeming himself aggrieved."

His allegations show that the eviction proceedings were an invasion of his rights in the property, as it must be, as the eviction is carried out under an assertion of title in the Government and a consequent denial of the title and right to possession in every one else. To show that the eviction proceedings were illegal and were a grievance to him, it was quite necessary for him to aver title in himself and therefore that averment cannot be taken as necessarily showing that his suit was only one for vindicating his geueral title. It is not necessary to consider if plaintiff could have framed his suit omitting all reference to the eviction proceedings in such a manner as to avoid the applicability of S. 14. It is sufficient to say that the present suit is not such a suit.

It is next argued that, so far as the claim for possession based on plaintiff's title is concerned, it should be treated as cutside the scope of the section and not necessarily a redress for the wrong done by eviction. This question was considered in the case of Kolla Gangama Naidu v. Secy. of State (1), and both the learned Judges there held that the wording of S. 14 is wide enough to include claims for recovery of possession. It cannot be denied that delivery of possession is one of the ways of redressing a person who has been wrongfully evicted. The only difference between that case and the present one is that, whereas in that case the person evicted was the plaintiff himself, the man evicted here is the plaintiff's tenant as he was in occupation of the land at the time. I do not think this makes any difference as to the applicability of S. 14 to the present suit. Under S. 6 of the Act, eviction proceedings have to be taken against the person occupying the land and against none else. The validity of the proceeding in the present case is not therefore affected in any way by notice not having been served on the plaintiff. In fact plaintiff himself applied to the Sub-Collector against the notice and subsequently sent a lawyer's notice to the Collector against it, all before the eviction. He was aware of the proceedings and treated them as affecting his rights, and it is not alleged that the proceedings were vitiated by any irregularity. It is suggested that he is not bound by the proceedings, as he was not a party to them and therefore he cannot be looked upon as a person aggrieved by them. I do not think this argument is sound in the present case. We have here to deal with eviction proceedings and in such a case, though a man may not be a party to the proceedings resulting in the order for eviction, and therefore not affected by it, his rights may be subsequently invaded by the actual eviction itself and thereby he may become a person aggrieved. That is the position in the present case. It will be noticed that the section does not say that the persons suing should be aggrieved by any proceedings "against them." These words "against them" are not in the section and we cannot read them into it.

The result therefore is that the plaintiff in the present suit is a person deeming himself aggrieved by proceedings under Madras Act 3 of 1905 seeking redress in the civil court, and the six months' rule applies to the suit. The decree of the Sub-Judge must therefore be reversed and that of the District Muhsif restored with costs here and in the lower Court.

Spencer, J.—I agree that the appeal must be allowed and the decree passed by the District Munsif restored with costs throughout. The prayer in the plaint is plainly for redress for the proceedings taken by the revenue authorities under Act 3 of 1905. The gist of the plaint and the conduct of the plaintiff in petitioning those authorities and in giving a notice of suit to the Collector make it impossible for him to deny that he is a person "deeming himself to be aggrieved" by proceedings under that Act.

Second Appeal No. 903 of 1917, Decided on 21st March 1918, against decree of Dist. Judge, Tanjore, in Appeal Suit No. 337 of 1916.

T. P. Act (1882), S. 41—Transfer of patta to help transferee to secure employment—Transferee whether ostensible owner — Purchase from transferee—Absence of enquiry as to title of vendor—Vendee held could not rely one title acquired by estoppel against real owner—Evidence Act (1872), S. 115.

When one person allows another to hold himself out as the owner of an estate and a third person purchases it for value from the apparent owner in the belief that he is the real owner, the vendee, when seeking to create a title to the property by estoppel as against the real owner, must satisfy the Court that he had neither actual nor constructive noticee of the real title and had not before him any circumstances which would have put him on reasonable inquiry to find out the truth [P 51 C 2]

Apart altogether from S. 41, T. P. Act, the Evidence Act affords no definition of estoppel to dispense with the necessity of the purchaser making reasonable inquiry: I. A. Sup. Vol. 40. [P 51 C 2].

Plaintiff transferred the patta for some of his lands to the name of his son-in-law, defendant 1, to help the latter in securing the appointment of Village Munsif; some time after defendant 1 filed a petition in insolvency and the Official Receiver dealt with the plaintiff's property, patta whereof had been transferred to defendant 1, as the latter's property and put it up for sale. Defendant 2 purchased it. It was found that he had made no inquiry as to the security of his title:

Held: that defendant could not rely on a title acquired by estoppel as against plaintiff 1.

Quaere: Whether the fact of the transfer of a patta would make the transferee an ostencible owner within the meaning of S. 41. [P 50 C 2]

Judgment.—This case raises a question as to the ownership of certain lands in a village in the Tanjore District. Plaintiff 1 was the Village Munsif of the village; plaintiff 2 is his son, and defendant 1 is his son-in-law. Some years ago plaintiff 1 who apparently was an old man—he has died since the institution of the suit—wished to relinquish his position as Village Munsif. His son was in the Revenue Department and did not wish to succeed him. So he desired the appointment for his son-in-law, defendant 1, and he applied to the Deputy Collector to appoint his son-in-law in his place. Apparently the Deputy Collector raised the point that the son-in-law must be a pattadar in the village in order to have the office of Village Munsif. Plaintiff 1 thereupon said that defendant 1 had not any lands standing in his name, but that he, plaintiff 1, would transfer his patta to defendant 1; and requested the Deputy Collector to carry out th transaction: and it appears from the documents in this case that what was done was that the patta of the suit lands wae transferred from the name of the fathers in-law to the name of the son-in-law, defendant 1. At a subsequent period defendant 1 filed his petition in insolvency in the Tanjore District Court and was adjudicated an insolvent. Thereupon his property vested in the Official Receiver; and finding, I suppose, that the patta of these lands stood in his name, the Official Receiver proceeded to deal with them as part of the estate available to the creditors. He put these lands up for sale and they were kept in suspense as soon as it was found that the title of defendant 2 would be questioned and it awaits the determination of this appeal.

Defendant 2 puts the case in three ways. In the first place, he says he is entitled to succeed under S. 41, T. P. Act. That section provides:

"Where with the consent, express or implied, of the persons interested in immovable property, a person is the ostensible owner of such property and transfer the same for consideration, the transfer shall not be voidable, on the ground that the transferor was not authorized to make it; provided that the transferee, after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer, has acted in good faith."

Now, it is unnecessary to discuss whether the fact of the transfer of patta would create the transferee an ostensible owner within the meaning of this section for the simple reason that, however that may be, on the finding of the learned Judge, the transferee in this case has obviously failed to satisfy the requirements of the proviso that he should take reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer; because the learned Judge in terms says that:

"the slightest inquiry would have shown defendant 2 that the title deeds were not with defendant 1 and that defendant 1 had no claim whatever to the land."

We cannot go behind that finding and that appears to dispose entirely of any case that the appellant might be supposed to have on the section of the Transfer of Property Act. But he puts his case wider than that, and he says:

"Apart altogether from the special remedy provided by S. 41, T. P. Act, I am entitled to rely upon the general law of estoppel, which for this country is embodied in S. 115, Evidence Act."

And he says:

"unfettered by the proviso and unencumbered with any duty of making particular inquiries, the general law of estoppel simply provides me with this remedy, that as a representation has been made to me in common with all the world by plaintiff 1 by putting the name of defendant 1 as the pattadar of his property, I am entitled to say that he shall not in future be allowed to maintain that defendant 1 was not the transferee of that property, and that being so I can preclude him in this suit without any reference to the section of the Transfer of Property Act from alleging that he is in fact and in truth the owner of the property."

Now with regard to that, the contention for respondent 2 in the first place is this: he says, you must take the very general provisions of the section of the Evidence Act as controlled and curtailed by S. 41, T. P. Act, and there is in fact a decision—a single Judge's decision no doubt—in Hoorbai v. Aisahbai (1) where Beaman, J., carefully considered the relations between the two sections and came to the conclusion that S. 41 must be regarded as restricting the more general principles of the section of the Evidence Act. He says:

"A very superficial analysis would reveal obvious distinctions between the ordinary principles of estoppel on the one hand and the application of the principles to which effect has been given under S 41, T. P. Act," and the effect of holding that will be to hold that the section of the Evidence Act is curtailed in this sense that the Transfer of Property Act forbids any peson to avail himself of the estoppel created by the Evidence Act in the case of transfers of immovable property, unless the transferee satisfies the further condition of having made reasonable inquiries as to the security of his title. It is really not necessary for us in this case to say whether that be so or not, for this reason that in the year 1872, in Ramcoomao Koondoo v. John and Maria McQueen (2), the Privy Council, at a time when the section of the Evidence Act was in force and the Transfer of Property Act had not yet been enacted, laid down that an estoppel of this kind in cases of transfer of real property could only be availed of by those who used the care and inquiry required by the provision of English equity. This is what their Lordships say:

"It is not necessary to say whether this case is to be decided upon the principles on which the English Court of Chancery acts in cases of resulting trusts, when questions arise between the equitable owner and the purchaser for value without notice; or whether it is to be decided upon the general rules of equity and good conscience which bind the Courts in India, because the principle of decision must in either case be the same. It is a principle of natural equity, which must be universally applicable, that, where one man allows another to hold himself out as the owner of an estate, and a third person purchases it, for value, from the apparent owner in the belief that he is the real owner the man who so allows the other to hold himself out shall not be permitted to recover upon his secret title, unless he can overthrow that of the purchaser by showing, either that he had direct. . . notice of the real title; or that there existed circumstances which ought to have put him upon an inquiry that, if prosecuted, would have led to a discovery of it."

It therefore appears that the Privy Council were prepared to hold, at a time when the section of the Transfer of Property Act was not in existence, that a person who sought to create a title to real property by estoppel must satisfy the Court that he had neither actual nor constructive notice and had not before him any circumstances which would have put him on reasonable inquiry to find out the truth. Here the learned Judge has found that this purchaser did not make the inquiries which were staring him in the face. He never inquired as to whom the lands belonged to, he never asked for the title-deeds, and we think one might gather from the fact that the Official Receiver held the purchase money in suspense all this time, he must have been told by the Official Receiver that he had no title-deeds and the question of title was one of great trouble and difficulty. However, we need not go into the evidence of that, because it is a matter definitely found by the Judge. We therefore hold following the decision of the Privy Council, that apart altogether from the section of the Transfer of Property Act, the Evidence Act affords no definition of estoppel to dispense with the necessity of the purchaser making a reasonable inquiry.

Madras Local Boards Act (1884), S. 98 (2) —"Other person duly authorized as aforesaid"—Meaning explained.

The words "other person duly authorised as aforesaid" in S. 98 (2) do not refer only to "some person duly authorized by him in that behalf" mentioned in S. 98 (1) of the Act.

There must be a separate authorization under each clause of the section and the words "as aforesaid" in Cl. 2 must be read as meaning "by him in that behalf". [P 52 C 1]

Public Prosecutor—for Appellant.

Judgment.— We cannot agree with the Subdivisional Magistrate that the words "other person duly authorized as aforesaid," in S. 98 (2), Local Boards Act, refer only to "some person duly authorized by him in that behalf" mentioned in S. 98 (1), for we think that the use of the single word "other" precludes this view, which would require the word "any" or "such other" to support it. In our opinion there must be a separate authorization under each clause of the section, and the words "as aforesaid" in Cl. 2 must be read as meaning "by him in that behalf." In this view the notice issued by the Union Chairman was valid, as authority has been given to him by Ex. C. S. 33 of the Act does not restrict specific delegations allowed by other sections of the Act, and there is no reason to read the words "other person" as meaning Vice-President alone.

The case against accused being a summons case no charge was necessary, and as accused was represented by a vakil he must have been aware of the charge against him, and could not have been prejudiced by the Magistrate's omission to explain it to him. We set aside the order of acquittal and confirm the conviction and sentence of the Sub-Magistrate.

Judgment.—(Appeal No. 373 of 1915.) —The object of the suit in which these appeals arise was to obtain a declaration that defendant 1 was not the adopted son of one Gopalakrishnayya and that the plaintiff was entitled to 1/15th share of the property in Sch. A to the plaint, to recover the same from the defendants, to obtain an apportionment of the property with reference to bad and good soil and for other reliefs. Defendants 84 and 85, unless defendant 93 was validly adopted by Manikyam, defendant 92, would be the nearest reversioners of Gopalakrishnayya and the plaintiff who is the remoter reversioner, claims 1/15th share of the estate under a deed of arrangement entered into between defendants 84 and 85, who had obtained a surrender of the properties from Gopalakrishnayya's mother Rangammah on 23rd November 1911, and the rest of the presumptive reversioners living at the time. Gopalakrishnayya had died on 30th July 1895 leaving a widow Ammama, who died subsequently on 23rd November 1911 whereupon the properties devolved on Gopalakrishnayya's mother Rangamma who would be about 90 years old and is still alive. The main contest was between the whole body of reversioners on one side basing their title on the surrender by Rangamma and on the other defendant claiming to have been validly adopted by the widow Ammama and defendant 93 claiming to have been adopted by Manikyam, defendant 92, the widow of one Koniah, a deceased first cousin of Gopalakrishnayya and who would therefore have a better right to the reversion than defendants 84 and 85. The defendants in the suit are, besides the reversioners other than the plaintiff, various other persons who are in possession of different items of property under some claim or other, either by transfer from the reversioners or from the widow or otherwise. Defendant 91, it may be mentioned, is the National College of Masulipatam to which a gift was made of 1/15th share by the reversioners. A large number of issues were tried and in the result the learned Subordinate Judge decreed the plaintiff's claim. We shall deal with the different questions argued before us in the several appeals and memoranda of objections in their order. On the question relating to the authority alleged to have been given by Gopalakrishnayya to his widow Ammama to make an adoption, we have no hesitation in agreeing with the conclusion of the learned Subordinate Judge.

The burden of proving that the adoption was made under proper authority lay upon defendant 1, but having considered the evidence of the defendant's witness on this point, we are not at all satisfied that Gopalakrishnayya gave authority as is alleged. Gopalakrishnayya died on 30th July 1895 and the case of the defendant is that the authority was given to the widow on the same day. It is not clear upon the evidence what he actually died of. The evidence adduced in support of the authority to adopt is that he died suddenly and that the illness, whatever it was, only occurred on the very date of his death. The man who is allegsd to have treated him, the defendants' 14th witness Amba Narasayya, says that he hardly knew what the matter was with this man, but however that may be, the important evidence on which Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar naturally relies in support of his case is that of witness 13 for the defendants, a second grade pleader. He says that he came to know Gopalakrishnayya as both of them were fond of music and used to meet at music parties and theatres. The learned Subordinate Judge has discussed this evidence at great length and his conclusion is that the testimony of this witness cannot be acted upon.

He points out that this witness's name did not appear in any of the lists of witnesses but that he was summoned only a few days before the defendants let in their evidence, and was not served with summons until the day before he was examined. The explanation as to why his name did not appear in any of the previous lists of witnesses is that it did not transpire that he was present at the time of Gopalkrishnayya's death or knew anything about the alleged authority to adopt, until defendants 14th witness Amba Narasayya happened to be questioned by the pleader for the defence when he disclosed this man's name. We find it impossible to believe that if this witness was actually present at the death-bed of Gopalakrishnayya, his name would not have been known to everybody else present there and that the defendants would not have known from the very beginning that this man knew about the authority to adopt. The other men who were present at Gopalakrishnayya's bedside were ordinary villagers and if defendants' 13th witness was also there and heard the deceased give authority to his wife to adopt a child on his death, it is fairly certain he would have been one of the first to be summoned to give evidence in the case. As regards the other witnesses the Subordinate Judge has dealt with their evidence in para. 128 of his judgment and we are unable to say that his estimate of their evidence is incorrect. Further the circumstances of the case strongly support the conclusion of the trial Judge. The authority is stated to have been given in 1865, but it is not mentioned in any sort of document or writing until the very date of adoption, that is till 1911. If any such authority had been received by Ammama, it can be assumed with certainty that there would have been more than one occasion to mention the fact during all these years. Ammama was seriously ill in 1898 and the Subordinate Judge is right in pointing out that if she had any authority to adopt, he would have made some attempt to carry out her husband's wishes at that time. The absence of all reference in Ex. FF to any such authority also negatives the supposition that the authority was actually given. It is pointed out by the learned Subordinate Judge that the story of the defence is that from the very birth of defendant 1 Ammama wanted to adopt him. If there was the least truth in the suggestion we cannot understand why, if she had received authority from her husband, she would have refrained from making the adoption till the very last day of her death. We therefore agree with the Subordinate Judge that the adoption of defendant 1 is not valid.

The adoption of defendant 93 by Manikyam, the widow of Koniah, is said to have taken place on 29th October 1911, that is to say, previous to Ex. S, the deed of surrender executed by Rangamma on 23rd November 1911. Manikyam at that date was 30 years of age and it is not disputed that though the authority to adopt had been given to her by her deceased husband 14 years ago, she made no attempt to adopt all this time, and there can be little doubt upon the evidence that if she did make the adoption as alleged, it must have been brought about more or less hurriedly and with the object of defeating the reversioners of Gopalakrishnayya who, it is said, were anxious to get hold of the estate by means of a surrender from Gopalakrishnayya's mother, Rangamma. Manikyam had also inherited from her husband somewhat valuable properties of the value of Rs. 15,000 and we have no hesitation in saying that if she was at all anxious to adopt in accordance with the authority given by her husband, she would have made the adoption long before 1911. The suggestion made on behalf of the appellant is that it was at the time that Ammama was taken ill that the idea occurred to her advisers, especially defendant 1 who was the gumasta of both Ammama and Manikyam, to have an adoption made by Manikyam in order to make sure that the property of Gopalakrishnayya did not go to the reversioners. There can be no doubt that the relations both of Ammama and Manikyam on the one hand and of the reversioners on the other were anxious to secure to themselves the property which was in the possession of Ammama and which on Ammama's death would devolve on Rangamma, the mother of Gopalakrishnayya.

The learned Subordinate Judge, having considered the evidence on both sides, has come to the conclusion that the story of the adoption of defendant 93 is not true. He has found himself unable to accept the testimony of the witnesses of the defendants who speak to the adoption taking place on 29th October 1911, and is inclined to accept the evidence of the witnesses of the plaintiff residing in the village of Guraza where the adoption is said to have taken place. They all state that they never heard of any such adoption and that if there had been one they would have known of it. Most of the witnesses in support of the adoption are relations of Manikyam or Ammama, but that in itself would not in a case of this nature, throw discredit on their testimony if we were in a position to say on a view of the undoubted facts and probabilities of the case that the story set up is true. Defendant 93 at the time of the alleged adoption was 7 or 8 years old; he belonged to a very poor family in Kavutharam. He used to go to a school at Kavutharam and the case is that he was brought to Guraza on 29th October, which happened to be a Sunday, and after the adoption was hastily performed on the same day, he went back with his parents to his village. From the school register it appears that he attended school as usual on the 30th. It is observed by the learned Judge that it is hardly likely that if the boy had been adopted, the adoptive mother would have allowed him to return to Kavutharam on the same day. The Subordinate Judge also comments on the fact that though his original name was said to have been changed and under the law, being affiliated to the family of his adoptive father, he would henceforth be known as the son of his adoptive father no alteration was made either in his name or in that of his father in the school register. As regards the actual ceremony, the Subordinate Judge is impressed by the fact that no sufficient publicity was given to the adoption and the adoption was not celebrated as one would expect it to be having regard to the fact that Manikyam was in fairly well-to-do circumstances. The absence of any music at the time of the ceremony, as specially pointed out, was a circumstance against the truth of the story of the defence.

There is one very important circumstance noted by the Subordinate Judge which militates against the theory of adoption, that is, the fact that the boy did not perform the shradh ceremony of the adoptive father which took place about 20 days from the date of the alleged adoption. Then the evidence is that he performed the two succeeding ceremonies at the village of Kavutharam while Manikyam herself was living at Guraza. It is also to be noted that the boy did not live with Manikyam at all for a long time after the alleged adoption. There are also other very significant circumstances which support the decision of the Subordinate Judge. On 24th November 1911, when the deed of surrender was presented for registration, it appears that a representation was made to the Sub-Registrar that as a matter of fact, Manikyam had adopted a son and therefore Rangamma was not entitled to make a valid surrender. Ex. LLLL is one of those petitions and it was sent by post and received by the Sub-Registrar on 24th. Ex. LLLL (1), the other petition, was presented to the Sub-Registrar personally by the brother of defendant 81. It is curious that in none of these petitions the name of the adopted son is mentioned, and we do not think that any proper explanation has been given for this omission. The Sub-Registrar who was examined in the case says that defendant 81 himself was present at the time of registration of Ex. S and when asked for the name of the adopted son he replied that the boy would come before the public in the course of a short time. We are asked to say that the evidence of the Sub-Registrar on the point is false. The Subordinate Judge, who saw the witness, did not find sufficient reason for disbelieving him; but apart from that, when we remember that there was so much anxiety displayed by the appellant's party to object to the registration of the deed of surrender and to set up an adoption, it is difficult to see why the name of the adopted son if the adoption had actually taken place, should not have been put forward.

Then we find that the will alleged to have been executed by Manikyam, Ex. XXX, and the deed of sale purporting to have been executed by her, Ex. UUUU, both bear the date of 29th October 1911, the date of the alleged adoption. The adoption is mentioned in Ex. XXX, and there can be very little doubt that the purpose for which Ex. XXX was executed whenever it might have been executed, was to supply evidence of this adoption. The Subordinate Judge has found that both these documents have been antedated, and it seems to us that there is force in the reasons given in support of this conclusion. If as a matter of fact the will was executed on 29th October, it is not at all clear why, having regard to the anxiety which Manikyam and her advisers had to defeat the contemplated surrender on the part of Rangamma no steps should have been taken at once to to register this document. Then in Ex. LLLL it is mentioned that certain documents, "executed between the said Manikyam and the adopted son were about to be registered," and this could not possibly refer to the will or to the deed of sale, Ex. UUUU, and it is not explained why if the will had been in existence it was not mentioned in Ex. LLLL. One would have thought that if Ex. XXX was in existence at that time, it would have been presented before the Sub-Registrar in support of the story of the alleged adoption. The truth seems to be, as suggested by the trial Judge, that Manikyam had no idea of adopting, but when her own relations and advisers found that the reversioners were going to obtain a surrender from Rangamma, they thought it necessary to give out that Manikyam had actually made an adoption. It may be assumed that Manikyam could not be persuaded to yield to the wishes of her advisers and make an adoption, but apparently it was not found easy to secure within the short time at their disposal a suitable boy whose parents or guardians would agree to such terms as would suit the purposes of Manikyam's relations and advisers. For instance the brother of Manikyam is claiming a valuable portion of the properties belonging to the estate of her husband, under a conveyance said to have been executed on the date of the alleged adoption. In these circumstances we must confirm the finding of the Subordinate Judge that the alleged adoption of defendant 93 has not been proved.

The surrender of Rangamma is attacked mainly on the ground that it is not a bona fide transaction, inasmuch as she received Rs. 6,000 as consideration for making the surrender in favour of defendants 84 and 85 who were the nearest reversioners. The property is of the value of about 1½ lakhs yielding an annual income of something like Rs. 10,000. At the time of the surrender, Rangamma was about 80 years old. It also appears that defendants 84 and 85 came to an arrangement with all the remoter reversioners as regards this property, and it may reasonably be that one of these persons will succeed on her death. The plaintiff, who seeks to recover his share under an arrangement of purchase from the surrenderees, is one of the remote reversioners. The question of law is undoubtedly one of difficulty, but so far as this Court is concerned, we must take it as settled by recent decisions reported as Kereti Brahmanaikudu v. Kereti Mahalakshmi (1) and Chella Subbiah Sastri v. Palury Pattabhiramayya (2). In the previous case it was regarded at the time of the surrender that part of the property would be reconveyed to the brother of the widow, and there was also a stipulation that she was to receive Rs. 400 though the amount apparently was not actually paid. Even in the face of these facts it was ruled, following the earlier case of Chella Subbiah Sastri v. Palury Pattabhiramayya (2), that the surrender was a valid one. We think that the present case is covered by those decisions. Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar tried to distinguish the present case from that in Chella Subbiah Sastri v. Palury Pattabhiramayya (2) on the ground that there is an observation by Sankaran Nair, J. that if part of the property be reconveyed to the widow in pursuance of an understanding at the time of the surrender, that might make a difference. But this observation is only by way of obiter, the main principle of the decision being that the fact that the consideration for the surrender was reconveyance of a portion of the property, though to a third person, does not ipso facto invalidate the surrender. In this the consideration for the surrender which would not amount to more than Rs. 6,000 at the most, was but a very small fraction of the entire property.

It is also argued that inasmuch as a house site worth about Rs. 600 is not included in the deed of surrender, the surrender cannot be said to be the entire estate as the law requires and is therefore bad. We do not think that there is any force in this contention. It is a very insignificant fraction that is not included in the surrender very likely through inadvertence, and this cannot be held to affect the substance of the transaction. It was further sought to be argued by Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar that the so called surrender was in fact an alienation of the properties by the widow to a number of persons, some at least among them being strangers not concerned in the reversion. He suggested that the surrender was a mere cloak in order to support alienations in favour of strangers. But this case was never sought to be made in the lower Court. No doubt in para. 6 of defendant 1's written statement there is a vague averment of conspiracy, but it cannot be said to have been intended to put forward a case that what purported to be a surrender in favour of the nearest reversioners, viz., defendants 84 and 85, was really meant by Rangamma to be a cloak for supporting alienations in favour of strangers. No such issue was raised and the learned Subordinate Judge who dealt with every matter raised during the trial at great length, has not alluded to any such question in his judgment. The surrender then was of practically the whole estate without reserving any portion of it to the widow, though a small sum of money was paid to the widow. In these circumstances the validity of the surrender is concluded so far as this Court is concerned by the decisions in Keretti Brahmanaikudu v. Kareti Mahalakshmi (1) and Challa Subbiah Sastri v. Palury Pattabhiramayya (2).

Then another point was raised by Mr. Ramchandra Aiyar that so far as the gift to the National College of 1/15th share of the property is concerned, it was not shown to have been accepted by the trustee of the College, as neither he nor the Secretary produced the deed at the time of the trial. The gift was not of an onerous nature and there is no reason for saying that it has not been accepted by the trustee. As a matter of fact both in the lower Court and before us in the arguments on behalf of defendant 1 it was persistently and earnestly urged that it was the trustee and other persons interested in the National College that brought about the surrender. We do not think that there is any substance in this objection. The next point urged before us is that this suit is not framed as a suit for partition and the Subordinate Judge was not right in declaring the shares of the different parties and in giving a decree for partition. As we read the plaint, it is a suit for partition and it has been so treated by the lower Court. The whole case has been tried on that basis.

The first point taken in the appeal on behalf of defendant 3 is that he should not have been made liable for mesne profits of item 9 in the schedule. It is suggested that he was in possession of that item on behalf of his minor natural son, defendant 1. It has been pointed out that defendant 1 is not entitled to the property, and as defendant 3 himself was in actual possession of the property, we think he has rightly been made liable for mesne profits. As regards costs, it is suggested that some issues were decided in favour of defendant 1 and defendant 3 and therefore the Sub-Judge was not right in awarding the whole costs against them. But they failed on the substantial questions raised in the trial and we do not think that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in his order as to costs. This disposes of the appeal by defendants 1 and 3. Appeal No. 373 of of 1915 is dismissed with costs.

(Appeals Nos. 420 and 421 of 1915).—These appeals must be dismissed with costs, on our finding that the adoption of defendant 93 did not, in fact, take place.

(*Appeal No.*384 of 1915).—This appeal relates to certain properties which belonged to the estate of Konayya and were inherited by his widow Manikyam. She sold these properties to her own brothers by Ex. UUUU for Rs. 5,000, which has been found and rightly so found to be a wholly inadequate consideration. assuming that it was paid, Mr. Narayanamurthi wishes to support the sale on the strength of Ex. 2, a will executed by Konayya. His contention is that under this will Manikyam became sole owner of the property inasmuch as no child was born to her. But it has been found in fact that there was no miscarriage and that a female child was born to Konayya after his death and died shortly after its birth. The last clause in the will to which reference is made says:

"If no such (child) should be born, the adopted son which my wife according to her pleasure may take, or my wife Manikyam should enjoy the . . . . property.

The gift to Manikyam is contingent on the child she was carrying not being born alive; this contingency did not happen as the child was in fact born alive and therefore the contemplated gift did not take effect in favour of Manikyam. This was the only question raised before us in the appeal which was argued on behalf of defendants 3 and 4. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

(*Appeal No.*422 of 1915).—This appeal raises the question of the validity of the lease of item 1 in the schedule granted by Ammama on the 4th December 1898 for 20 years to her father for a rent of Rs. 1,500 a year. The lease will expire in two years' time, and the question argued before us is whether such a lease is competent for the widow to grant. The Subordinate Judge has found that in the circumstances it could not be said to be an improvident lease and has upheld it. It appears that the tenants, who were in possession of the lands, were creating difficulties and it was probable that without considerable litigation no rent would have been realized from them. We find that as a matter of fact Ammama's father had to bring a number of suits in order to eject the tenants who were denying his title and to recover the lands. It is stated that rent reserved in the original lease granted to Gopalakrishnayya was Rs 1,900. But having regard to the difficulty of realizing the rent, the Subordinate Judge is right in saying that the reduction of rent was justified. No doubt the lease was executed by Ammama in favour of her father, but it is difficult to say that it was done with a view to favour him as Ammama in fact prosecuted her father in a criminal Court on some charges in connexion with the accounts of her property. We are not therefore prepared to differ from the conclusion of the learned Subordinate Judge that the lease, under the circumstances, was a fair and bona fide transaction. That being so, it is undoubtedly valid in law. Mr. Ramadoss on behalf of the appellant also claims interest on the rents decreed to him. But having regard to the frame of the suit and the fact that the rents decreed were mostly for periods subsequent to the institution of the suit, we do not think we would be justified in giving him interest.

Item 2 in the schedule was bought by Ammama's father at a Court auction. The property was under mortgage to Ammama's husband Gopalakrishnayya, and in order to enforce it, a mortgage suit was brought, and in pursuance of the decree in that suit it was brought to sale. It was sold for Rs. 600 odd, although the decretal amount was about Rs. 2,000. Ammama's father was apparently a fairly well-to-do man and had sufficient means to buy this property. It is found that after him his son, defendant 2, has been in possession, paying kist or Government revenue. It also appears that in a suit instituted by Rangamma against Ammama for maintenance Ammama disclaimed all interest in this property; and in the proceeding before the arbitrators in the dispute between Ammama and her father, she did not claim the property as her own. These facts go to show that the property really was brought by Ammama's father bona fide and not as benamidar for Ammama. Much reliance is placed on an entry in the account books of the pleader who acted in the proceedings in the mortgage suit. These accounts show that a ledger was opened in Ammama's father's name and this property was purchased on his behalf. There is however a transfer of a small sum of Rs. 2-12 0 to Ammama's ledger, she being debited with this amount as it was incurred in respect of costs for taking delivery of the property. We do not think that this is sufficient to outweigh the other evidence which goes to show that the property was bought by Ammama's father on his own account. The burden lay upon the plaintiff to prove that the transaction was of a benami character, but, far from that burden being discharged, the evidence shows that the purchase was not benami.

Item 10 in the schedule, which consists of 25 cents of land, appears to have been made a gift of by Ammama to her purohit, defendant, 73 on the occasion of the Kistna Pushkaram. It is alleged that there is no registered instrument to evidence the gift and therefore it must be disallowed. No such plea however was taken and the question was not raised before the lower Court. We cannot therefore allow it to be raised now. This objection as regards item 10 is therefore disallowed. Appeal No. 422 of 1915 fails and is dismissed with costs. So also the memorandum of objections in Appeal No. 373 of 1915 argued by Mr. Ramadoss.

The memorandum of objections in Appeal No. 422 of 1915 filed on behalf of defendants 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 21 relates to items 11, 15, 12, and 16, in the schedule. As regards item 11, the Subordinate Judge has awarded mesne profits at the rate of Rs. 20 for all the shares and as regards item 15 he has awarded at the rate of 15 tooms an acre and at Rs. 50 a patti. It is contended that, as a matter of fact, these items are not in the possession of defendant. 7. No doubt in his evidence he denies that he is in possession. But it is expressly alleged in the plaint that these items are in the possession of defendant 7 and in his written statement there is no clear or positive denial of the allegation in the plaint. As regards item 12, the Subordinate Judge has given mesne profits at Rs. 50 per patti and we are not in a position to say why he ought to have awarded, as is now contended, Rs. 44 and not Rs. 50. As regards item 16, the Subordinate Judge has awarded Rs. 480-6-0 while, as a matter of fact, the amount claimed is Rs. 413. The decree will therefore be modified by reducing the amount to Rs. 413, otherwise the memorandum of objections fails and is dismissed with costs.

The memorandum of objections in Appeal No. 373 of 1915. (For the memorandum of objections argued by Mr. Ramadoss vide under Appeal No. 422 of 1915 supra.) As regards the memorandum of objections of the defendant 76 (respondent 13) the mesne profits awarded will be reduced to what is claimed against him in the plaint.

Defendant 2's (respondent 2's) memorandum of objections. The Subordinate Judge has found that the 14 cents, which is part of item 2, belongs to Ammama and we do not see special reason for interfering with that finding. Nor is there any ground for interfering with the conclusion of the Subordinate Judge as regards the liability of defendant 2 for the mesne profits of item 9. The technical objection however to the form of the decree with reference to item (1) is well founded, inasmuch as this item of property is under a lease and will not expire till some time in 1918. The Subordinate Judge was not therefore right in so framing the decree as to give the plaintiff a present right to partition of this property. We think that there ought to be a paragraph in the decree after para. 2 to this effect: that the right of the plaintiff to item (1) of the schedule be declared subject to the leasehold interest of defendant 2 under Ex. HHH. As a consequence of that in para. 3 of the decree, after the words "other than items" add "1 and 2." The paragraphs will be re-numbered. Subject to the above modifications of the decree the memorandum of objections is dismissed with costs.

Respondent 18's memorandum of objections.— This relates to a part of item 20 amounting to about 7 acres odd. This property was sold in auction in execution of the decree obtained by Rangamma against Ammama. The Subordinate Judge has found that the purchase by respondent 1 who was the gumasta of Ammama, was made on behalf of Ammama herself. There is considerable evidence in support of this finding which is also in accordance with the probabilities of the case. The memorandum of objections is dismissed with costs.

PHILLIPS AND KRISHNAN, JJ.

Mangeshwar Naraina Rao — Defendant—Appellant.

v.

S. Shiva Rao and others—Plaintiffs—Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 912 of 1917. Decided on 3rd April 1918, against decree of Dist. Judge, South Canara, in Appeal Suit No. 301 of 1916.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 34, R 14—Lease of mortgaged property to mortgagor—Covenant for payment of specified rent and for delivery back on default to mortgagee with interest on arrears of rent and future rent—Property charged with all sums due—Decree for rent—Redemption after decree becomes barred—Mortgagee cannot claim decretal amount for he has already elected one remedy—Civil P. C (1908), O. 2, R. 2.

A deed of usufructuary mortgage executed in 1863 provided that the mortgagor was himself to continue in possession paying a certain specified rent. In default of such payment before the end of March of each year, the mortgagee was to take possession at once and to charge rent at an amount equal to 12 per cent interest on the mortgage money; that 12 per cent was to be paid on the arrears of rent, the mortgaged property being liable for the total amount. There was a further clause that on redemption the mortgagor should pay the mortgage money together with any arrears of rent and interest due. Default having been made in payment of rent, the mortgagee sued the mortgagor in 1871 for possession and arrears of rent and interest at 12 per cent and for future rent and interest at the same rate. Possession was taken by the mortgagee under the decree but execution for the rent and interest decreed was allowed to become barred. In a suit for redemption by the mortgagor, the mortgagee claimed to be paid the amount due under the decree and all interest. The mortgagor offered to pay only the principal amount:

Held: that the mortgagee was not entitled to the barred decree amount: 21 I. C. 701 and 40 I. C. 358, Dist.

Per Phillips, J.—When a mortgagee elects to enforce one remedy, he cannot, after having obtained that relief, be allowed to abandon the relief first chosen and fall back upon the other, when his right to enforce the first has been allowed to become barred by limitation. [P 61 C 1]

Per Krishnan, J.—The obtaining of a personal decree by a mortgagee does not per se put an end to the charge on the property. That is the English rule and there is no reason why the same rule should not be applied to India. But the enforcement of the charge can be made only so long as the claim under the decree is not barred by limitation. The claim to rent was on the obtaining of the decree taken out of the operation of the contract between the parties and passed into the domain of judgment. It was not open afterwards to either party to ignore the decree and fall back on their antecedent rights and obligations. If the decree was satisfied or assigned away by the mortgagee he could no longer enforce any charge. On the same principle if the decree ceased to be enforceable by limitation the charge also failed. The mortgagee could not be allowed to take advantage of a redemption suit to enforce stale and time-barred claims. [P 62 C 2]

B. Sitarama Row—for Appellant.

K. Y. Adiga—for Respondents.

Phillips, J.—Plaintiffs sue to redeem a usufructuary mortgage of 1868 for Rs. 1,650. In the mortgage deed there is a provision that the mortgagor is to take back possession and pay a stipulated rent. In default of payment of this rent the mortgagee was to recover possession and the mortgagor was to pay a sum equivalent to 12 per cent on Rs. 1,650 as rent from the date of the mortgage deed until the mortgagee got back possession. The mortgagor failed to pay rent as stipulated and the mortgagee obtained a decree in 1873 for possession and for Rs. 200 odd claimed as rent and for future rent. It does not appear that this decree was ever satisfied and the mortgagee now claims to add the decree amount and subsequent interest to his mortgage money. Under the mortgage deed the payment to be made by the mortgagor was made a charge on the property and there was an undertaking to pay it back together with the mortgage amount.

The question for consideration is whether the mortgagee is entitled to demand the decree amount of 1873 together with subsequent interest before redemption. It is contended for respondent that the amount due became merged in the decree, and that as the decree has now become barred the amount cannot now be claimed. It would appear that under American law the respondent's contention is correct (vide Jones on Mortgages, S. 936), but the position is not so clear either in English or Indian law ; for it would appear from a passage in 21 Halsbury 325 that the original charge would still remain unless the decree became satisfied, and it is questionable whether a decree that has become barred by limitation is on the same footing as a decree that has been satisfied. It cannot be disputed that a mortgagee is entitled, when accounts are settled at the time of redemption, to put forward claims, for the recovery of which a suit would be barred and it is unnecessary to cite authority for this proposition, but whether an amount for which the mortgagee has obtained a decree, the execution of which is barred by limitation, can be treated on the same footing as a barred debt is questionable. In Hewanchal Singh v. Jawahir Singh (1) it was held that when a decree had been obtained for interest due on a mortgage the tender of the principal amount alone would not be a proper tender of principal and interest ; but the question of whether the mortgagee could demand the decree amount again was not specifically decided and in that case the decree was still alive. The judgment of the Judicial Committee is very brief and gives no reasons for the decision. In the present case we have not to consider whether the decree amount and subsequent interest can be claimed ; for it is not claimed on the ground that the amount was decreed, but on the ground that the whole amount can be claimed under the mortgage deed. On looking into the deed it appears that the penalty that could be claimed by the mortgagee on default in payment of rent by the mortgagor was a sum equivalent to 12 per cent. interest per annum on the principal amount, and although it is called rent it is really interest on the mortgage money, and out of the total decree amount Rs. 198 is really one year's interest on the mortgage money. To allow a claim for this amount with subsequent interest from 1873 to date of redemption would be to allow compound interest for which no provision is made in the mortgage-deed. No doubt the deed provides for interest on arrears of rent but the decree did not really provide for arrears of rent, and although it does not enforce the stipulation that interest shall be payable from the date of the deed, but only from date of default it is impossible to go into that question now, and we can only assume that only one year's interest was due at the date of decree. This amount without subsequent interest can alone be claimed. The balance of Rupees 5-6-0 due under the decree, is for road cess, but if the Rs. 198 awarded is treated as interest the mortgagor was under no obligation to pay road cess, which is only payable upon rent. In this view the appellant mortgagee is only entitled to claim Rs. 198, the amount due to him at date of the decree.

Treating this Rs. 198 as interest upon the principal which is made a charge upon the property, can it be said that the charge upon the property has become merged in the decree? It is contended for appellant that O. 34, R. 14, Civil P. C., supports the view that the claim can be enforced apart from the decree, but that rule only provides that a decree for money in satisfaction of a claim under a mortgage is no bar to a subsequent suit for sale in enforcement of the mortgage, but it is no authority for saying that the decree amount can also be claimed in the subsequent suit. It is urged then on the other side that to allow the decree amount to be claimed again would be contrary to the principle of O. 2, R. 2, for by bringing a suit for money the claim to make it a charge upon the property must be deemed to be abandoned, but in order that this argument should succeed, it is necessary to show that a suit against the property could have been brought when the claim was made for money alone. In this case it certainly could not have been, and consequently the mortgagee's claim is not contrary to the principle of O. 2, R. 2. It may however be contended that by obtaining a decree for money which could be enforced at once the mortgagee abandoned the charge which he would only enforce later, and there is considerable force in this contention. It is the view taken in Imdad Hasan Khan v. Badri Prasad (2), in which case Hewanchal Singh v. Jawahir Singh (1) was considered and I think it is in this case the correct view, for having elected to enforce one remedy, and having obtained that relief, the mortgagee cannot now be allowed to abandon the relief first chosen and fall back upon the other when his right to enforce the first has been allowed to be barred by limitation. It is possible that the Allahabad view that even while the decree is alive the other remedy cannot be enforced goes too far, but it is unnecessary to consider that now.

This appeal accordingly fails and is dismissed with costs. In view of the above finding the memorandum of objections relating to mesne profits from the date of tender of the mortgage money must be allowed with costs. The amount which has now been found to be correct was tendered through Court, and under S. 84, T. P. Act, interest ceased from that date. Time for redemption extended to four months from this date. Mesne profits to be determined before final decree.

Krishnan, J.—The suit from which this second appeal arises was one for the redemption of a mortgage by conditional sale of 1868. The plaintiff mortgagor sought to redeem on payment of the mortgage money alone, viz., Rs. 1,650. The mortgagee claimed that he should be paid in addition a sum of Rs. 2,474-12-0, which was stated to be the amount of rent and interest on it due to him under the decree in Original Suit No. 199 of 1872. The way in which the decree came to be passed is as follows:

Though the mortgage was one with possession, it was arranged in the mortgage deed itself that the mortgagor should himself continue in possession as the mortgagee's tenant paying a stipulated rent every year before the end of March. There was a condition added that if the mortgagor failed to pay the rent on the due date in any year, the mortgagee was to have the right to take possession at once, and to charge rent at an amount equal to 12 per cent. interest on the mortgage money, which works out at Rs. 198 a year; this amount was much higher than the rent originally fixed. It was also arranged that 12 per cent. interest should be paid on the arrears of rent and that the mortgaged property should be liable for the total amount. There was a further clause that on redemption the mortgagor should pay the mortgage money together with any arrears of rent and interest due. In 1871 default was made in payment of the rent due and the mortgagee brought Original Suit No. 199 of 1872 against the mortgagor and obtained a decree for possession and for arrears of rent and interest at 12 per cent. and for some road cess, in all for a little over Rs. 200 with future rent and interest at the same rate. In execution of this decree possession was taken by the mortgagee but it does not appear that he has been paid the rent decreed. It is that rent with interest added to it for the last 40 years and more that he now claims to be paid before redemption. It is not denied that his decree was long ago barred by limitation.

The first Court allowed his claim but the appellate Court disallowed it and he has appealed to us to claim it. It was conceded on his behalf that his claim was not sustainable so far as it was based on the covenant in the mortgage deed to pay the arrears of rent with the mortgage money, in view of the ruling in Ramakrishna Kukkilaya v. Nekkar Kuppanna (3), but it was argued that as in the present case there was a charge on the property for the rent due, he could rely upon it and claim to be paid the amount of it before redemption in spite of the having obtained a decree for it and in spite of that decree having become barred by limitation. That there is a charge created by the language of the document must be admitted, and in this particular there is a difference between the present case and the one in Ramakrishna Kukkilaya v. Nekkar Kuppanna (3). But I do not think that makes any real difference in the result. I am inclined to agree with the appellant's argument that the obtaining of a personal decree does not per se put an end to the charge on the property. That that is the English rule is clear from the statement of the law in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 21, S. 579, and from the cases cited there in support of it : Lloyd v. Mason (4) and O'Brien v. Lewis (5). There is no reason why the same rule should not be applied in India In fact O. 34, R. 14, Civil P. C., recognizes the principle and gives the right to bring a second suit to enforce the security. It seems to me also that their Lordships of the Privy Council adopted this rule in the case in Hewanchal Singh v. Jawahir Singh (1), though the matter is not free from doubt as their judgment is very brief. It may however be remarked that they make no difference between interest for the first year for which a decree had been obtained even before payment into Court and that for the second year it is no doubt possible to take their ruling to refer to interest for the second year, as has been done by the Allahabad High Court in Imdad Hasan Khan v. Badri Prasad (2). But I think having reference to the facts of the case as appear from the report and the argument before the Privy Council, the learned Judges of the Allahabad Court have taken too narrow a view of the effect of that decision.

(2) [1898] 20 All. 401.

(3) [1918] 43 I. C. 236.

On the authority of the same Allahabad case, the respondent has contended that the obtaining of a decree by itself put an end to the mortgagee's right to rely upon the charge. It is not clear from the report whether the decree which the mortgagee had obtained there for Government revenue paid by him was a subsisting one at the date of the suit for redemption or not, and also whether it had not been assigned away. If it was subsisting and unassigned, I am, with all respect to the learned Judges, inclined to think that their ruling on the point has gone too far. They treat the case as one of election of remedies and hold that having elected to sue on the personal covenant the mortgagee could not rely on his right under S. 72, T. P. Act I do not think the principle of election was properly applied, as in the second suit the mortgagee was only a defendant and was not seeking any remedy himself but was only setting up a condition for granting to the mortgagor the right of redemption sought to be enforced by him. To apply the principle of election in such a case seems to me to be in effect equivalent to extending the scope of O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C., or of S. 43 of the old Code, which was then in force, to defences. which is unwarranted. The argument that, if the mortgagee is allowed to rely on his security for the amounts for which he has obtained decrees, the mortgagor may be compelled to pay the same amount twice over in cases where those decrees are assigned to third parties, does not seem to me to be of any force, as the security is attached to the decree and an assignment of the decree can no longer be availed of by the mortgagee. In fact it is exactly like the transfer of any other part of a mortgagee's claim to third parties. As I have already pointed out, it is doubtful whether too narrow a view has not been taken of the effect of the Privy Council decision by the learned Judges. Furthermore, the English rule on the point was not brought to their notice. For all these reason I think the ruling in that case on the point in question cannot be followed if the decree there was a subsisting one and was not assigned away. But even assuming that a mortgagee does not lose his charge by obtaining a personal decree, but can plead it and claim to be paid the amount of it in a redemption suit, the appellant must still fail as I think that can be done only so long as the claim under the decree is not barred by limitation.

When the appellant obtained his decree for rent, his rights with regard to it were regulated thereafter entirely by the terms of that decree; the claim to it was taken out of the operation of the contract between the parties and passed into the domain of judgment. It was not open afterwards to either party to ignore the decree and fall back on their antecedent rights and obligations. In short, the claim for arrears of rent became merged in the decree and though the charge did not become extinguished, it became thereafter attached to the decree amount so far as it represented the original rent. If the decree was satisfied or assigned away by the mortgagee, he could no longer enforce any charge. I think on the same principle if the decree ceased to be enforceable by limitation the charge also failed. By the obtaining of the decree the claim for rent, even though it was originally a part of the mortgage transaction, was dissociated from the mortgage and became an independent claim on the property; and therefore the principle recognized in the cases in Athan Kutti v. Matavil Illoth Sutarjanam (6), Kesar Kunwar v. Kashi Ram (7) and Ramakrishna Kukkilaya v. Nekkar Kuppanna (3), that a mortgagee cannot be allowed to take advantage of a redemption suit to enforce his stale and time-barred claims unconnected with the mortgage under redemption, applied to it. The cases in Parasurama Pattar v. Venkatachalam Pattar (8) and Nathamuni Pillai v. Vengammal (9), cited by the appllant, referred to claims arising under one and the same mortgage transaction. In neither of them had any decree been obtained for a part of the mortgage claim as in the present case, and therefore the question arising here was not considered.

The principle stated in the last case, following the English cases of Edmunds v. Waugh (10) and Marshfield, In re, Marshfield v. Hutchings (11), that the limitation of a mortgagee's right to recover must not be read as a good plea to be urged by a mortgagor endeavouring to redeem, applies only to claims arising under the particular mortgages under redemption and not to those outside it. In the Privy Council case in Hewanchal Singh v. Jawahir Singh (1) and in the two English cases of Lloyd v. Mason (4) and O'Brien v. Lewis (5), above cited, the decrees were alive. In fact in O'Brien's case (5) Knight Bruce L. J., adds a direction "for allowing against the judgment what has been or shall be obtained by means of the lien", showing that the enforcement of the lien was for the purpose of paying the decree debt. No case has been cited by the appellant against the view I am taking. On the other hand Jones in his Treatise on Mortgages, S. 936, states the American rule clearly thus;

"The merger of the note in a judgment does not extinguish the debt and the mortgage continues a lien till it is satisfied or the judgment is barred by the Statute of Limitation," and cites numerous American authorities in support of it. Though this is the American law, it seems to me it enunciates a principle which we may well accept. It follows then that assuming the appellant could have asked at the time of redemption to be paid the amount of his decree in Original Suit No. 199 of 1872, so far as it represented the rent due to him, if his decree had been kept alive, his right to do so ceased on that decree becoming barred by limitation. The second appeal therefore fails, and I agree with my learned brother that it must be dismissed with costs. As a result I also agree that the memorandum of objections should be allowed with costs and to the other portions of his order.

Where a decree does not provide for the working out of the rights of the puisne encumbrancer without additions to it which the executing Court has no power to make, such rights are not barred of enforcement by a separate suit by the provisions of S. 47, Civil P. C. [P 64 C 2]

The fact that a puisne mortgagee did not, in the first mortgagee's suit in which he was impleaded as a party defendant, take steps to ascertain the extent of his right of redemption of the earlier mortgage will not affect his right to have the equity of redemption sold as against his mortgagor. This right is different from the right to redeem. The puisne mortgagee may elect to bring his own suit for his money.

Judgment. — As the Subordinate Judge has dismissed the plaintiff's suit on the preliminary ground that it is barred by S. 11 and by S. 47, Civil P. C., it is not necessary to state all the facts of the case which are a little complicated. The question arises in these circumstances: Plaintiff's father, as puisne mortgagee, was made a party to each of the two suits of the prior mortgagees, defendants 17 and 18, brought to enforce their mortgages by sale of the hypotheca. He did not appear and raise any pleas; decrees were passed in both suits in the usual form under S. 88, T. P. Act, which was then in force, and naturally the decrees made no mention of the puisne mortgagee's right to redeem; as to the surplus sale proceeds if any the order was that they were to be paid "to defendant or other persons entitled to them." Orders absolute were subsequently obtained, but before any sale in Court auction took place, the mortgaged properties were sold by private arrangement to defendant 14 who was to pay the sale proceeds to the decree-holders. Sale deeds were accordingly executed to him by the mortgagors and one decree was satisfied in full and the other in part by him. The question for our decision is whether in the above circumstances, this suit by the plaintiff as the puisne mortgagee to enforce his mortgage by sale of the property mortgaged subject to the prior mortgagee's claim is barred either by S. 11 or by S. 47, Civil P. C.

As stated above the Subordinate Judge has answered the question in the affirmative, but we are unable to support his view. The objection based on S. 47, Civil P. C., may be considered first. For that section to apply, the question raised in the second suit should relate to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the previous decree. The relief claimed must be such as could be obtained by execution proceedings. That depends on the terms of the decree. The question is really concluded by the ruling of the Privy Council in Gopi Narain Khauna v. Bansidhar (1), where their Lordships held that where the decree did not provide for the working out of the rights of the puisne encumbrancer without additions to it which the executing Court had no power to make, a new decree was necessary for the purpose and S. 244 (now S. 47) of the old Civil P. C. would not bar the second suit. It is impossible to hold in the present case that on the terms of the decree here plaintiff could have got the relief, he now seeks by execution. The question whether he has lost his right by not getting a proper decree is irrelevant in considering the applicability of S. 47.

It has been held that even when a puisne mortgagee is expressly given by the decree a right to redeem and a right to share in the surplus sale proceeds, he is not barred from bringing a fresh suit for sale against the mortgagor. on the ground that in execution of a prior mortgagee's decree when it is in the form given in Appendix D (Sch. 1, Form 7), he is not entitled to insist on being redeemed himself or to get the property sold for his debt: see Sarat Chandra Roy v. Nahapiet (2). Mackintosh v. Watkins (3). Sarurijigar Begam v. Baroda Kant Mitter (4). The ruling in Debendra Nath Sen v. Mirza Abdul Somed (5) is also to the same effect, though there is an observation there that this suit would be barred if he was in a position to have his claim satisfied from the surplus proceeds. That must be understood as applying only to a case where the pusine mortgagee is given by the decree itself the right to apply for sale of the property.

The first three Calcutta cases above cited were recently considered and followed by a Bench of this Court in Vedavyasa Ayyar v. Madura Hindu Sabha Nidhi Co. Ltd. (6), which was a case where the decree gave the puisne mortgagee the right to redeem and also a right to share in the sale proceeds; and the property was sold in Court-auction, but the sale was set aside under O. 21, R. 89, Civil P. C. The learned Judges held that the second suit was not barred either by by S. 47, or by S. 11 We agree with this ruling and hold that S. 47, is no bar to the present suit, the circumstances here being more favourable to the second mortgagee than in that case on the point under consideration.

The next question is as to the applicability of S. 11, Civil P. C. To apply that section the matter in issue in the second suit must have been in issue and been decided in the previous suit. It is not suggested that there has been any express decision against the right the plaintiff now claims. But it is argued that S. 11 read with Expl. 4, raises a bar. That explanation says, so far as it is relevant here, that any matter that might and ought to have been a ground of defence should be deemed to have been in issue; and therefore if the decree involved a decision on it, that decision will be res judicata in the same manner as an express decision on an issue. The question then is to what extent the decree in the prior mortgage suit can be taken to have decided by implication the right of the second mortgagee.

The Sub-Judge observes that the second mortgagee

" could have and ought to have proved his mortgage and obtained a decree for redemption and failing that he could not institute a second suit ignoring the previous litigation."

No doubt the Sub-Judge is right when he says that if he wished to exercise his right of redemption he should have appeared and claimed it in the previous suit. The ruling of the Privy Council in Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (7), referred to by the Sub-Judge has decided that point. But the mistake made by the Sub-Judge is that he overlooks the fact that the present suit is not one for redeeming the prior mortgage ; plaintiff is seeking now to sell the property subject to the prior mortgage : that is not a right he could have put forward against the prior mortgagee. That a puisne mortgagee can now sue for sale of the equity of redemption without joining the prior mortgagee as a party and without offering to redeem him is made clear by the explanation to O. 34, R. 1, Civil P. C. The same view was held in Madras even before: see Gangadhara v. Sivarama (8), Srinivasa Rao Saheb v. Yamunabhai Ammal (9) and Ranga Aiyangar v. Narayana Chariar (10).

That being so the fact that the previous decision might have barred him from asserting again his right of redemption against the prior mortgage under S. 11, Civil P. C., does not affect his right to have the equity of redemption sold as against his mortgagor. No doubt if he had appeared on the previous occasion he might have claimed to share in the surplus sale proceeds also, but his right to it has not been negatived by the previous decrees; for the provision in them is that these surplus sale proceeds are to be paid to any person who is entitled to them. This leaves the matter open apparently to be decided in another suit. As stated before, it was decided in Vedavyasa Ayyar v. Madura Hindu Sabha Nidhi Co., Ltd. (6) that even where the puisne mortgagee has a right under the decree to share in the sale proceeds, his right to sue is not barred as the former right is different in many respects from the latter right. This conclusion was arrived at after considering the case in Govinda Taragan v. Veeran (11) which was also cited to us. Though we accepted that ruling in Vedavyasa Ayyar v. Madura Hindu Sabha Nidhi Co., Ltd. (6) in this case we need not go so far: for in the present decree there is no definite provision as to who should be paid those excess proceeds. It cannot be said that the puisne mortgagee was bound to get an order in his favour to share in the sale proceeds when he was made a party. No rule of law has been pointed out to us that compels him to do that. He may elect to bring his own suit for his money.

The Subordinate Judge relied also on the ruling in Nattu Krishnama Chariar v. Annangara Chariar (12) in support of his view that the second suit was barred. But that was a case where a person had two mortgages himself on the same property and failed to mention the second when suing on the first. He was held barred from suing again on the second. The decision is therefore clearly distinguishable from the present case, which is one of a prior and a different puisne mortgagee. In any case we consider the authority of that decision has been much shaken by the ruling of the Full Bench in Subramania Aiyar v. Balasubramania Aiyar (13), though it has not been expressly overruled. We see no distinction bet ween the holder of two mortgages suing on the second reserving the first and vice versa. If the nonreservation is to make the difference between the 30 Madras case and the Full Bench case, it must be a difference based on S. 43, old Civil P. C., or O. 2, R. 2, of the present Code. That difference does not seem to be valid, for the Full Bench have held that the two mortgages are two different causes of action and have answered the query of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (i) in the affirmative. We are not prepared, with all respect to the learned Judges, to follow the view in the Nattu Krishnama Chariar's case (12). Our attention was also drawn to the sixth proposition laid down by Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., in Chinnu Pillai v. Venkatasamy Chettiar (14) that:

"if mortgagee 1, sues first making mortgagee 2, a party as he ought to, there cannot be a trial of a further action."

With all respect to the learned Judge this is clearly an obiter dictum and it has, in our cpinion, been stated somewhat too broadly. The question must depend on the findings and the decree in the first suit and on the execution proceedings. We are unable to adopt the proposition as stated without qualification. We must therefore hold that S. 11, Civil P. C., is also no bar to the present suit. Two further arguments of Mr. Ramadas for the respondents remain to be noticed. He drew our attention to the observations of their Lordships in Het Ram v. Shadi Ram (15) and to S. 89, T. P. Act, and contended that on the order absolute being passed the right to redeem was extinguished as well as the security and there was thereafter nothing for the plaintiff to get sold. This argument is the result of confusion between the equity of redemption which is an interest in land and is by itself immovable property and the right to redeem which is only a right attached to the equity of redemption. The former is not affected by an order absolute and can only be extinguished by a sale in Court auction confirmed subsequently of the whole property. The second argument was that the security of mortgagee 2 was also extinguished by the order absolute. Neither the section nor the observations of their Lordships referred to the security of mortgagee 2; they clearly refer to the security sought to be enforced in suit; that is that of mortgagee 1, in this case. If the property is sold by Court free of encumbrances mortgagee 2's security will cease to have effect on that property, but that effect is not produced by a private sale by the mortgagor as in the present case. We must therefore hold that the decree of the Subordinate Judge cannot be supported on the ground taken by him and we must reverse it; but as he has not disposed of all the questions raised in appeal we must remand the appeal to him for fresh disposal. The costs of this second appeal will be costs in the cause and will be disposed of by the Subordinate Judge.

(d) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 73—Diligent decree-holder invoking aid of Court should not be kept out of right because others are not equally diligent—Only restriction is rateable distribution under S. 73.

The general principle is that a person who is diligent enough to invoke the aid of the Court in satisfaction of his decree should not be kept out of his rights because others have not been equally diligent in seeking their redress. The only restriction upon his rights is that if, before he sets the process of the Court in motion to realize the assets, others have applied for execution, he should share the realized assets with those other applicants. There is no warrant for holding that a person who has applied for payment should be put off on the chance of some others having claims on the property coming in at some time to have the property distributed rateably.

Oldfield, J.—The fund in dispute in this case represents property originally attached by one of the present respondents before judgment. But we have not been shown that this fact in any way improves his claim or that of the others. None of them had even obtained decrees when appellant secured his attachment. They applied in execution only after he did so; and the question is whether his application for payment out being (for whatever reason) still pending, when their applications were made, the whole fund should be distributed rateably. The lower Court quite properly followed Suikeena Katun v. Mahomed Abdul Aziz (1) and passed an order in respondents' favour.

But the case was decided by a single Judge and we are therefore not concluded by it. I deal with it and not with the decisions in Bisheshar Das v. Ambika Pershad (2) and Thakurdas Moti Lal v. Joseph Iskender (3), because in them the discussion proceeded either with reference to the incidents of an attachment before judgment, which are not relied on before us, or on very general grounds. With all due deference, I cannot follow Bakewell, J., in Suikeena Katun v. Mahomed Abdul Aziz (1), where he lays down that an attachment under O. 21, R. 52, Civil P. C., in no circumstances confers priority. In Frederick Peacock v. Madan Gopal (4), the first case relied on by him, the competition being between an attaching creditor and the Official Assignee, special considerations arose; and in it and in the other case cited, Sankaralinga Reddi v. Kandasami Tevan (5), the attachment was of property, which as the language used in the former suggests and the latter states explicitly was not a fund in a Court, but had to be sold before its value could be realized. This affords a clear ground of distinction from the facts before us and it must be added, those in question before Bakewell, J., for S. 295 of the former Code referred to assets realized in execution and applications made prior to their realization as S. 73 of the Code now in force refers to applications for execution made prior to the Court's receipt of the assets; and accordingly in both the cases relied on by the learned Judge the provision which justified rateable distribution was directly applicable, whilst in the case before him, as in the case before us, it is not. A similarly general statement by the Judicial Committee in Moti Lal v. Karrab-ul-din (6) that attachment only prevents alienation and confers no title, is no doubt relied on in the Calcutta case above referred to and it, no doubt, was made without reference to any provision of the Code corresponding with the present S. 73.

But the question arose with reference the effect of an attachment, which apparently was made in execution of a mortgage decree and which clearly differed from that in question here and before Bakewell, J., because a sale, which was to transfer ownership, was to follow. It is, with all respect, unsafe to rely on these authorities as decisive, when the question is of circumstances with which they were not concerned. It is in fact hardly disputed that the one provision of the Code authorizing rateable distribution, S. 73, is inapplicable in terms to

(1) [1915] 38 Mad. 221=29 I. C. 239.
(2) A. I. R. 1915 All. 275=29 I. C. 622=37 All 575.
(3) [1917] 44 Cal. 1072=41 I. C. 516.

(6) [1898] 25 Cal. 179=24 I. A. 170=7 Sar. 222 (P. C.).

the present case, if only because the assets in question were received by the Court, before respondent's applications were or could have been made. The provision attained its present scope by stages at successive revisions of the Code; and as it is to be supposed that it was enacted advisedly, there is no reason for a liberal construction. It is true that S. 270 of the Code of 1859, by which the attaching creditor was entitled to be paid first out of the proceeds of property sold under his attachment, was not re-enacted in 1882 or 1908. But that provision did not in terms affect the attachment of a fund and there is no reason for assuming that its disappearance, whatever its effect in cases to which it was applicable, affected the application of the English rule conferring a priority to which Bakewell, J., has referred. The material point is that a fund, attached under O. 21, R. 52, requires no further realization and that in the absence of creditors entitled to apply under S. 73, there can, from the moment that the attachment is laid on it, be no obstacle to its payment to the attaching creditor. This is recognized by the procedure authorized by the Civil Rules of Practice Nos. 179, 180, under which, after (if necessary) his decree has been transferred to the Court, where the fund is the attaching creditor is entitled to be paid as if he were an assignee of the judgment-debtor.

In the present case, as the diary shows the appellant had applied for and was ready to receive payment, when the lower Court's proceedings were suspended by a prohibitory order from the subordinate Court, of what nature and passed at whose instance does not appear. No reliance has been placed on that order before us; and the conclusion must be that appellant should not have been frustrated in his effort to obtain money, to which he had established a subsisting right, by respondents, who had none, and that the lower Court in allowing rateable distribution acted without jurisdiction.

The lower Court's order must be set aside, the petitions being remanded to it in order that it may deal with them according to law in the light of the foregoing, dismissing the petitions of respondents and ordering payment on that of appellant. Costs to date will follow the result and be provided for in the order to be passed.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—I agree. The question for consideration relates to priority among the various decree-holders of a common judgment-debtor. The undisputed facts are, that the petitioner obtained a decree against the common judgment-debtor on 2nd December 1916. On 4th December he applied for attachment of a fund in Court belonging to the judgment-debtor and on 6th December he applied for the payment out in him of the money in Court. The other judgment-creditors of the common judgment-debtor had not obtained their decrees on this date. The District Munsif, instead of directing the payment to the petitioner, held his hand as there were other claims, though they had not matured into decrees on the date of the application by the petitioner and were still pending decision in various Courts. The conclusion of the District Munsif was that the petitioner was not entitled to priority, and that the money in Court should be distributed proportionately to all persons who may obtain decrees against the judgment-debtor. This civil revision petition has been filed against that order.

There was no contention before us that the application to this Court is not within S. 115, Civil P.C. It may safely be said of this petition that there was irregularity in the exercise of jurisdiction. The real question is whether the procedure adopted by the District Munsif is one allowed by law. He is undoubtedly supported by Suikeena Katun v. Mahomed Abdul Aziz (1) and by the observations of Mookerjee, J., in Thakurdas Moti Lal v. Joseph Iskender (3). As against these decisions there is Tiruvangadial v. Thiruvangadih (1), in which the present Chief Justice took a difierent view. Although the learned Chief Justice refers to the decision of a Bench of this Court as supporting him it is clear, on examining the reference, that the point now in question was not decided by the late Chief Justice and Sankaran Nair, J., in the appeal referred to in Tiruvangadial Thiruvangadih (7). The question has now to be examined on principle. Bakewell, J., is apparently of opinion that there is a general principle in the Indian legislature that all creditors of the same debtor should have equal rights in the latter's property. I am not satisfied that there is any such principle in our Code. The first enunciation of the rule on this subject is to be found in Ss. 270 and 271, Act 8 of 1859. S. 270 distinctly declares that a person who first takes out execution of his decree is entitled to be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale. S. 271 introduced the principle of the rateable distribution with regard to the surplus proceeds that may be left after the first attaching creditor had satisfied himself. Apparently under this Code the person who attached the property and brought it to sale was regarded as having a claim to priority over their creditors. In the next two Codes of Civil Procedure, namely, those of 1877 and 1882, a further change was introduced in favour of rateable distribution. The priority of the attaching creditor was abolished and the rule was stated to be that where assets are realized by sale or otherwise in execution of a decree and where more persons than one had prior to the realization applied to the Court by which such assets are held the assets shall be divided rateably amongst all such applicants.

In the Act of 1908 another change in favour of rateable distribution was introduced by omitting the words "realized by sale or otherwise" and substituting for them the words "are held by the Court." But the essential condition was retained, namely, that persons applying for distribution pari passu must have made applications to the Court for the execution of decrees before the receipt of assets. It is thus clear from an examination of these provisions that there is progressive tendency in favour of rateable distribution. I may even say that there is a tendency to restrict the rights of the first applicant. But certain conditions have still to be complied with if the benefit of such a provision is to be availed of. Bakewell, J.'s judgment would lead one to suppose that wherever there are a number of decrees against a common judgment-debtor the principle of rateable distriction should be enforced, whether there have been applications for execution prior to the realization of the assets or not. If that were the object of the legislature, it could have then easily declared that no person having a decree against a judgment-debtor shall be entitled to priority by virtue of the fact that he had applied for execution before others. The Indian law has provided for rateable distribution to all creditors in administrative actions and in insolvency matters. Under O. 20, R. 13, if there is an administrative action and the assets are in the hands of the Court, its distribution is governed by the same principles as obtain with regard to distribution of assets of an insolvent judgment-debtor. No question of applying priority to the realization of assets and no question of execution application arise under this rule. S. 73, Civil P. C., is therefore restricted in its operation to other than administrative actions. If we turn to O. 21, R. 52, it seems clear that priority is within the contemplation of the legislature because it says:

"Any question of title or priority arising between the decree-holder and any other person shall be determined by the Court."

In my opinion the general principle is this, that a person who is diligent enough to invoke the aid of the Court in satisfaction of his decree should not be kept out of his rights because others have not been equally diligent in seeking their redress. The only restriction upon his right is that, if before he sets the process of the Court in motion to realize the assets, others have applied for execution he should share the realized assets with these other applicants. There is no warrant for holding that a person who had applied for payment should be put off on the chance of some others having claims on the property coming in at some time to have the property distributed rateably. It is not easy to see how long this process of waiting should be enforced. Is it to be only, as in the present case, in favour of persons who have filed suits or is the Court to embark on an inquiry whether there are other creditors who may at some future time file suits to obtain decrees? In my opinion, as pointed out by the Judicial Committee in Mina Kumari Bibi v. Bijoy Singh (8), S. 73 should be construed as applying only to persons who come within the strict letter of the law. I am unable to agree with Bakewell, J., that there is an underlying principle in our jurisprudence and in our Procedure Code that every creditor should have equal chance of payment from out of the assets of the judgment-debtor, whether he is diligent or not and whether he takes prompt steps to enforce his rights or not. I agree with the conclusion come to by the present Chief Justice in Thiruvangadial v. Thiruvangadih (7). As regards Thakur Das Moti Lal v. Joseph Iskender (3) on the facts of that case the present question did not arise for decision. There are some observations by way of obiter in the judgment of Mookerjee J., who invokes the aid of justice, equity and good conscience in favour of equal apportionment to all decree-holders. It has been laid down by the Judicial Committee that under S. 53, T. P. Act, if one creditor is preferred by a debtor honestly, that would not be a preference which would avoid the transaction. I am referring to this for the purpose of showing that a person who is diligent enough to get from his debtor his rights is not to be asked to give them up because there are others who have similar rights but who have not taken steps to enforce them. If there is any one principle which guides our Courts, it is the principle of enabling persons who are diligent enough to secure their rights to get full satisfaction of their claims without compelling them to share the property of the judgment-debtor along with others who did not move promptly in the matter.

(8) A. I. R. 1916 P. C. 238=40 I. C. 242 = 44 Cal. 662=44 I. A. 72 (P.C.).

I would therefore allow the petition and set aside the order of the District Munsif and direct him to proceed with the matter in the light of the above observations.

Second Appeal No. 139 of 1917, Decided on 2nd May 1919, from decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Madura, in Original Suit No. 9 of 1916.

Compromise—Advantage derived malafide by one party must be deemed to be held in trust for person prejudiced and should be restored—Alienee in good faith from such person is not affected — Trusts Act (2 of 1882), Ss. 89 and 96

Where a compromise is entered into as between persons one of whom could not have in good faith believed in the claim put forward by him and the latter secures an undue advantage to the prejudice of the other party, such advantage must be deemed to be held in trust for the benefit of the person prejudiced or his representative and should be restored to the latter. An alienee in good faith and for consideration from the party who has secured such advantage is not however affected by the infirmities affecting his alienor's title: A. I. R. 1917 *P. Judgment.—We are not satisfied that the learned Subordinate Judge has sufficiently considered the bearing of all the material evidence in this case on the questions whether there was a bona fide dispute which was settled by the compromise embodied in Ex. A and the partition deed Ex. C or a fair family settlement. He has not considered the effect of the evidence as to the property, which is the subject of the present suit and in the hands of the alienee, having been the separate property of Mailchamy and his branch, having come to them from their grandmother's father, the Zamindar of Ayakudi. He has also not considered with reference to the question of bona fides the evidence as to whether the two branches were divided or not. This evidence must be taken into account in order to arrive at a conclusion whether the compromise now in question was really a bona fide compromise of doubtful claims or a fair family settlement. Before disposing of the case we must call for a fresh finding on these questions. We leave it to the discretion of the learned Subordinate Judge to decide whether fresh evidence should be taken.

We direct the Subordinate Judge to return findings on the following issues:

(1) Was the property in dispute the separate property of Mailchamy? (2) Were Mailchamy and Mandalathipathi undivided? (3) Was there a bona fide dispute which was settled by Exs. A and C or did they amount to a fair family arrangement? In considering this question the evidence as to the existence of a will by Mailchamy leaving property to be divided into three shares, will also have to be considered. Two months will be allowed for the submission of the finding and seven days for objections.

[In compliance with the order contained in the above judgment the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Madura submitted the following:]

Findings.—The High Court having remanded the case for finding on the following issues, viz: (i) Whether the property in dispute is the separate property of Mailchami and his branch, having come to them from their grandmother's father the Zamindar of Ayakudi? (ii) Were Mailchamy and Mandalathipathi undivided? (iii) Was there a bona fide dispute which was settled by Exs. A and C or did they amount to any family arrangement? I submit the following findings:

Issue 1.—The suit properties consist of eight items. Of these items Nos. 6 and 8 are house properties and the rest are lands. It is not clearly stated in the plaint how the suit properties are the separate properties of Mailchamy and his branch.

Plaintiffs' vakil says that it is never the plaintiffs' case that the properties are Manjakkani properties of Mailchamy's grandmother Madamma, but their case is that they are the self-acquisition of Mailchamy in his own lifetime, having been given to him by the Zamindar of Ayakudi on account of love and affection towards him. I shall therefore consider whether the properties were the self-acquisition of Mailchamy in his own lifetime. In support of their contention, plaintiffs examined Sivaswami Pillai (P. W. 10), who was Karnam of Ayakudi. They also rely on the statement, Ex. LL, filed by defendant 3 in the criminal proceedings and on the decriptions contained in the documents Exs. CC, DD, G and E executed by Mailchamy. Sivaswami Pillai (P. W. 10) says in his chief examination that items 1, 2 and 7 (which are situate in the block called Panchanthangi and irrigated by Papan channel) and also items 4 and 5 (which are Combai Punjai) were given to Mailchamy by the Zamindar. Defendant 3 also in her statement (Ex. LL) stated that the suit properties were given to her father-in-law Mailchamy by the zemindar. But the statement of these two witnesses is worthless. P. W. 10 admitted in his cross examination that he had no personal knowledge of the alleged gift to Mailchamy by the zemindar. Defendant 3 also had no personal knowledge, and in the plaint, Ex. M, which she subsequently filed, she ceased to mention that the suit properties were her father-in-law's self-acquisition. As regards items 2 to 6 and 8, Mailchamy himself nowhere described them as his self acquisition. He was describing as his self-acquisition only items 1 and 7 (for the description of item 1, see Exs. CC, DD, G and for description of item 7, see Ex. C). To consider that at least these two items 1 and 7 were his self-acquisition, I do not think that the mere recitals in the above said documents are sufficient in the evidence.

I therefore hold that none of the suit properties are the self-acquisition of Mailchamy in his lifetime. They are not either Manjakkani properties (streedhanam) of Mailchamy's grandmother according to the plaintiffs' vakil's own admission.

Issue 2.—Then with regard to the second question, there is no direct evidence, either oral or documentary, on the point of division set up by the plaintiffs. The matter is to be judged merely from circumstantial evidence. It is conceded on all hands that Mandalathipathi's father and grandfather lived at Balasamudram and remained in possession of the properties there, while Mailchamy and his father lived at Ayakudi and remained in possession of the properties situate in that village. It is also in evidence that the patta for Ayakudi lands stood in the name of Mailchamy (vide pattas T series) and that he alone was paying the taxes on those lands and also on the houses situate in that village (vide receipts Exs. U, W, Y series), while the patta for Balasamudram lands stood in the name of Mandalathipathi's father (vide receipts Ex. L) and after his death in the name of Mandalathipati (vide patta Ex. SS). Also each branch was alienating the properties in its separate possession as its own. To begin with the alienations of Balasamudram properties by Mandalathipati's branch alone, Mandalathipati's father executed in 1865 two mortgages of some ancestral lands at Balasamudram as if they belonged to him exclusively, and died in 1868 (vide recitals in Ex. L). Afterwards Mandalathipathi's mother as guardian of Mandalathipathi discharged these two debts by selling away the mortgaged lands for Rs. 8,000 (vide sale deed Ex. L). Mandalathipathi's mother as his guardian sold away also one ancestral house in 1873 under sa deed Ex. H, as if it belonged to Mandalathipathi's branch alone. Mandalathipathi himself after he attained majority executed a mortgage of all the remaining ancestral lands at Balasamudram as if they were his own (vide mortgage-deed Ex. M) and lent the money so raised on that mortgage to a certain Mahomedan, Kadir Lebbai (vide Ex. AA), without the concern of Mailchamy. Similarly from 1881 Mailchamy alone commenced to make alienations of the ancestral properties at Ayakudi in his possession as if they were his own (vide mortgages and sale deed—Exs. Q, R, OO, and CC). All these circumstances—the separate living of the two families from the time of Mandalathipathi's grandfather, separate possession and enjoyment of separate properties by each branch, separate pattas and separate payment of kists and separate dealings with the separate properties in their repsective possession as if they were their own properties—all these clearly indicate that the two branches must have become divided both in status and estate at least so far back as 1865.

It is argued by the defendants' vakil that the two branches might be joint and the alienations made by Mandalathipathi's father in his time and those made after his death by Mailchamy might be in their capacity as the then family managers. But the subsequent conduct of Mandalathipathi and his mother leaves no room for any such supposition. If the two families were undivided, Mailchamy as the senior member and manager would be the proper person in execute Exs. L and H either singly or jointly with Mandalathipathi's mother. But instead of that we find Mandalathipathi's mother alone executing those deeds as guardian of Mandalathipathi and treating him as the absolute owner of Balasamudram properties. As above pointed out, Mandalathipathi also after attaining majority considered himself to be the absolute owner of the properties situate at Balsamudram. He got the patta for Balasamudram lands issued in his name and he sold away some of those properties and mortgaged some, without reference to Mailchamy. Such cannot be the case if the two families were joint and Mailchamy was the manager after the death of Mandalathipathi's father. Defendants' vakil next argues that the properties described as ancestral and dealt with under Exs. H, L, K and M might have been the self-acquisition of either Mandalathipathi's grandfather or father, and not derived from the common ancestor, and that Mandalathipathi and his parents therefore rightly dealt with those properties without reference to Mailchamy. But there is no proof that the properties so dealt with were the self-acquisition of Mandalathipathi's grandfather or father.

Then with regard to the evidence on the defence side, defendants have absolutely no evidence whatever to show that the income from the lands of the two villages was ever mixed together and used by both families for common purposes during the lifetime of Mandalathipathi's father and grandfather. To prove jointness defendants rely mainly on the fact that during his minority Mandalathipathi lived with Mailchamy and that the latter then managed the properties in the two villages. Mandalathipathi lost his father in 1869 and mother in 1876. At the time of the death of his mother he was about 7½ years old. Defence witnesses Viswanatha Monigar (D. W. 1), Suppiah Chetti (D. W. 3), Sankaralingam Pillai (D. W. 4), Venkatagiri Nainavaru (D. W. 6), and also defendant 3 (D. W. 7) say that since his mother's death and until 1896 Mandalathipathi lived at Ayakudi with Mailchamy. D. Ws. 1 and 2 further say that Mailchamy then managed also the lands at Balasamudram and received the paddy from those lands. That Mandalathipathi lived with Mailchamy for some time after his mother's death is admitted also by plaintiff's eleventh witness (Chithanaha Vadhiar) and by Mailchamy himself in his written statement Ex. K K-1. But I do not attach any special importance to this circumstance. It may be that Mailchamy took Mandalathipathi into his protection and looked also after his lands, seeing that he lost both his parents and there was no other to take care of him. This was what Mailchamy stated in Ex. K-K 1. There is not a single document to show that Mailchamy treated Balasamudram properties as his own even during that period.

During the time Mandalathipathi lived with Mailchamy, Mailchamy attested two sale deeds (Exs. J and K) executed by Mandalathipathi in respect of the ancestral houses at Balasamudram. Similarly Mandalathipathi attested usufructuary mortgage (Ex. B-B) and a sale deed (Ex. Z) of Ayakudi lands executed by Mailchamy. Further Mandalathipathi having owed some rent to the mortgagee under Ex. B-B, Mailchamy undertook to pay it on Mailchamy's behalf (vide Ex. XV). Defendants contend that these acts indicate that Mailchamy and Mandalathipathi had joint interest in all the properties situate in both the villages. But mere attestations alone of each other's documents do not signify any such thing. At no time they executed or took any document in their joint names. Then about Mailchamy's undertaking to pay the rent due by Mandalathipathi, it is not known under what circumstances he had so undertaken. The above circumstances are therefore not sufficient to warrant an inference of jointness.

Defendants rely also on the written statement Ex. KK-1 put in by Mailchamy in answer to Mandalathipathi's plaint Ex. KK. But I do not think that statement helps them in any way. No doubt Mailchamy has not expressly stated in Ex. KK-1 that there was any regular partition between the two families. But he openly denied that the two families were joint and alleged that the sole and independent enjoyment by each branch of the properties in their respective possession from several years operated as a virtual or de facto division. That appears to be his plea by reading together paras. 4 and 5 of that statement. Such is the evidence on both sides. In my opinion, the whole evidence and inferences from facts proved are consistent only with the hypothesis of separation of the two branches in estate also long before the death of Mandalathipathi's father. My finding then is that Mailchamy and Mandalathipathi were not joint.

Coming now to the question whether the will set up by defendant 3 is true, Viswanatha Monigar (D. W. 1), Suppiah Chetti (D. W. 2), Sankaralingam Pillai (D. W. 4) and defendant 3 (D. W. 7) say that Mailchamy died on 14th May 1901, that four days before his death, i. e., on 10th May, he executed a will by which he bequeathed all his properties equally to his daughter (defendant 1), daughter-in-law (defendant 3) and nephew (Mandalathipathi) and that the said will was written by one Perumalswami Naicken and attested by D. Ws. 1, 2 and 4 and 15 others. Venkatagiri Nainavaru (D. W. 6) says that he came to Ayakudi on the next day after the execution of the will, that Mailchamy then mentioned the will to him and that it was also read over to the witness. But the evidence of these witnesses is interested and conflicting. D. Ws. 1 and 2 hold decrees against defendant 2 and it is therefore their interest to see that defendant 2 is not deprived of the plaint properties. D. W. 4 is indebted to defendant 4. D. W. 6 is a near relation of defendant 3, and it was he who conducted all the criminal proceedings on behalf of defendant 3 and also the suit of 1902. D. W. 4 says that Mailchamy divided his properties among the three legatees and that three lists showing the properties given to each legatee were prepared along with the will. But D. W. 1 does not say that any such division was made and lists were prepared. In her plaint, Ex. MM, defendant 3 set up that her father-in-law made another will previously on 7th May 1901, by which he bequeathed all his properties equally to her and her daughter alone. But that prior will is now denied. The first mention of the will now in question was made by defendant 3 only in her plaint (Ex. MM) filed in February 1902 after a long interval of nine months. It was never put forward before. The reason given by the defendant's witnesses for its nonregistration is that at the instigation of Mandalathipathi, Perumalswami Naicken duped defendants 1 and 3 by saying that the Registrar would come. But it is not a satisfactory reason. Mailchamy would not have allowed Perumalswami Naicken to make any delay.

On the plaintiffs' side P. W. 1 (defendant 1) denies that any will was executed by her father. Also plaintiff and P. W. 11 (Palace Tutor) say that Mailchamy did not execute any will before his death. For the above reasons I find that the alleged will is not true.

Issue 3.—I have found that the two branches were divided Neither defendant 1 nor Mandalathipathi could have been in ignorance or in doubt as to that fact. After he had attained majority, Mandalathipathi got the patta for Balasamudram lands issued in his name and mortgaged those lands as if they were his own. He thus considered himself to be a divided member. Defendant 3 also cannot be said to have any honest and bona fide belief in the claim she was making. I therefore hold that the compromise (Ex. A) and the subsequent partition deed (Ex. C) were not bona fide, nor can they be properly called a family settlement.

This appeal came on for final hearing after the return of the finding of the lower Court on 28th April 1919.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—The property in suit was lost in the possession of one Mailchamy who died in May 1901. He left behind him a daughter, a daughter-in-law of a predeceased son and one Mandalathipathi, a distant cousin. This cousin was living with the deceased for some years before his death. After his death disputes arose regarding succession to his property. The daughter-in-law put forward a will alleged to have been executed by Mailchamy, under which she claimed that she was entitled to a third of his property. The Magistrate who inquired into the claim as to possession decided against her. Thereupon she sued to establish her one-third share in the properties. The daughter of Mailchamy, who is the defendant 1 in the suit, denied that the property was the separate property of Mailchamy and also the genuineness of the will. Mandalathipathi on the other hand claimed the property to have come to him by survivorship as he and Mailchamy were undivided. During the course of the trial the parties entered into a compromise which is Ex C in this case. By the compromise the daughter-in-law was given considerably less than the one-third which she claimed, and the rest of the property was directed to be divided practically half and half between the defendant 1 and Mandalathipathi. The property was enjoyed jointly by the defendant 1 and Mandalathipathi until 1907, when there was an actual division by metes and bounds between the two people. In 1910 Mandalathipathi mortgaged these and other properties not comprised in the suit to the present defendant 4 who brought a stit on the mortgage and obtained a decree. The present suit is by the sons of the defendant 1 to set aside inter alia the mortgage in favour of defendant 4.

On the last occasion the Subordinate Judge found, without deciding whether the will was genuine and whether Mailchamy and Mandalathipathi were divided or not, that the compromise was bona fide and should be enforced. We pointed out in our order that the bona fides of the compromise must be determined with reference to the facts whether the will was genuine and whether Mailchamy and Mandalathipathi were divided. The present Subordinate Judge has returned findings to the effect that the two branches were divided and that the will was not genuine. He has also found that the compromise is not binding, inasmuch as Mandalathipathi could not have honestly believed in the claim he put forward as being entitled to the property by survivorship. On the first two questions, we are satisfied that his findings are supported by the evidence he has referred to. It is true that the question has to be considered with reference to the state of affairs that existed at the time of the compromise and although Mandalathipathi filed a suit, which he subsequently withdrew, to set aside an alienation by Mailachmy on the ground that the property was undivided, the course of dealing by the two branches of family, their long separate residence and the absence of reliable evidence regarding common enjoyment far outweigh the absence of a regular deed of partition. I am not therefore prepared to differ from the Subordinate Judge on this question. As regards the will, both the first Subordinate Judge and the present Subordinate Judge have agreed in holding that the evidence is insufficient to support its genuineness and I see no reason to differ from them.

At the same time, I must point out that there is no evidence that the defendant 1 with full knowledge that there was no truth in the claim put forward by the daughter-in-law and Mandalathipathi agreed to the compromise from ulterior motives. There is not sufficient evidence to lead us to the conclusion that in assenting to the terms of the compromise she was not acting bona fide in the light of the circumstances then brought to her notice. I have now to deal with the last of the findings of the Subordinate Judge. It may be, if the question arose between the plaintiffs and Mandalathipathi having regard to the decision of the Judicial Committee in Gunjeshwar Kunwar v. Durga Prashad Singh (1), the plaintiffs would be entitled to a decree, but the question is whether an alienee from a party who had not bona fide believed in the claim put forward by him is in the same position as the party himself. Our attention was drawn by the learned vakil for the respondents to Ss. 89 and 96, Trusts Act. The former section provides that where any advantage is gained by the exercise of undue influence in derogation of the interests of another, the person gaining such without consideration must hold the advantage for the benefit of the persons whose interests have been so prejudiced. S. 96 protects the right of transferees in good faith for consideration from persons who have gained an undue advantage. In my opinion, Mandalathipathi was in the position of a joint trustee within the meaning of S. 89, Trusts Act. Therefore the principle enunciated in these two sections is applicable to the present case. It is the principle of equity recognized in the Trusts Act and in other legislative enactments that a purchaser for value without notice of any defect of title in his transferor is entitled to protection if he obtained the transfer bona fide.

Then it was said that the defendant, did not really represent the reversioners in the previous litigation. There is some justification for this contention in the language of the written statement; but having regard to the fact that the object of the statement was to defeat the claim of the person who set up the will, too much importance should not be attached to the order in which the denials occur. In the written statement two alternative pleas were put forward, the one denying the will and the other suggesting a jus tertii. Further this question of defendant 1 not representing the estate was not put forward in the present case in the pleadings. Moreover, before the suit which ended in the compromise was filed, and also on the very same day on which the compromise was entered into, and afterwards, defendant 1 made statements about the property claiming it on behalf of her sons: vide Exhibits LL and V. Therefore I am of opinion that she must be taken to have entered into the compromise as representing the estate.

The further question is whether defendant 4 is a bona fide transferee for value without notice of any infirmities in the title of the transferor. On this question there is the evidence that he paid full consideration and that he was not aware of the defect in the title of Mandalathipathi. There is no evidence on the other side that he was aware that Mandalathipathi had practised any fraud upon defendant 1 and that he had no right to the property which he purported to mortgage. I must therefore hold that defendant 4 is a bona fide transferee for value. The result is that the suit against defendant 4 must be dismissed with costs, and the decree of the Subordinate Judge will be confirmed in that respect. As regards properties in the possession of the other defendants, having regard to Gunjeshwar Kunwar v. Durga Prashad Singh (1), plaintiff is entitled to recover possession including the properties in the possession of defendant 3, whose rights to maintenance will not be affected by this judgment. The decree, so far as these defendants are concerned, is reversed. Plaintiffs are entitled to their costs against these defendants and must pay the costs of defendant 4 in this Court.

Order of Reference.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The plaintiff is the appellant. The suit was brought to obtain a mortgage decree for sale on the mortgage document Ex. H, dated 11th May 1903, executed by defendant 1 to the plaintiff for Rs. 1,150. Defendants 2 and 3 are the undivided sons of defendant 1. Defendant 3 is still a minor, while defendant 2 was a minor on the date of the mortgage bond Ex. H. According to the recital in Ex. H, the sum of Rs. 1,150 mentioned in it as consideration is made up as follows: (a) Rs. 833-8-0 being the sum due on the registered mortgage bond Ex. G of 1899; (b) Rs. 130-1-0 due on the simple debt bond of 1902, Ex. K; (c) Rs. 43 received by defendant 1, for excavating a well in the family garden; (d) Rs. 100 for discharging the debt of Nattukottai Karuppan Chettiar; (e) Rs. 43-7 0 received for excavating the well already mentioned and for family expenses; total Rs. 1,150. Defendant 1 (the father) as usual remained ex parte. His sons (defendants 2 and 3), contended that their two-third share in the mortgaged properties cannot be affected by the mortgage because "the suit debt was not contracted either for family benefit or for any necessity binding on the family (para. 4 of the written statement)."

It will be seen from the written statement defendants 2 and 3 did not question ths genuineness of the mortgage-deed Ex. H or the existence of the debts, that is the passing of consideration for Ex. H; nor did they plead that the document was legally invalid as a mortgage for any reason. Their defence was confined to the contention that the mortgage debt was not binding on their shares of the mortgaged property. As defendant 1 remained ex parte, the District Munsif had to raise the point for determination as to his execution of the document in order to give a decision against him. On 11th June 1915, a single consolidated issue was raised by the District Munsif as follows:

"Whether the suit document is genuine and supported by consideration and binding on defendant 2 and 3's shares."

In the judgment of the District Munsif, the issue has been split up into two as follows: (1) Whether the suit document is genuine and supported by consideration, and (2) whether the suit document is binding cn defendant 2 and 3's shares. The Munsif notes in para. 6 of his judgment that issue 2 was the only one really contested by the contesting defendants 2 and 3, whose vakil noted on Ex. H that he admitted its genuineness. The vakil also noted on the documents Exs. A to G that he admitted their genuineness. The plaintiff, who was not even cross-examined, proved the genuineness of Exs. J and K. Clearly Mr. R. Srinivasa Rao, who appeared as vakil for defendant 2 and 3's before the District Munsif, did not deny the genuineness or validity as a mortgage document of the deed Exs. H sued on or of the other documents Ex. A to G. The Munsif found on issue 1 (which was not contested by the contesting defendants) in the plaintiff's favour, and he found on issue 2 that the suit document is binding on the shares of defendants 2 and 3 to the extent of Rs. 1,106-9-0 out of the principal sum of Rs. 1,150 mentioned in Ex. H, the sum of Rs. 43-7-0 received in cash on the date of Ex. H not having been proved to have been borrowed for family necessity. The District Munsif held that the remaining Rs. 1,106-9-0 constituted antecedent debts, and hence the mortgage was binding to that extent on the shares of defendants 2 and 3 also. He gave a mortgage decree accordingly for that sum and interest.

On appeal the same vakil who had appeared for the appellants in the District Munsif's Court was allowed to contend that Ex. H was not proved to be valid as a mortgage because it had not been proved by the evidence of an attesting witness under S. 68, Evidence Act, and the other mortgage documents Exs. B, C, E, F and G had also not been so proved by the evidence of an attesting witness for each of the documents' or by proof that the attestation of one attesting witness was in his handwriting under S. 69, Evidence Act. I might add that in the grounds of appeal to the lower appellate Court, no express reference is made to the necessity of the proof of any of these documents by an attesting witness or to the necessity of the proof of an attesting witnesss' handwriting. The District Judge accepted this contention and held that Ex. B, C and E to H were inadmissible in evidence as not properly proved. Yet he upheld, rather inconsistently, the decree of the District Munsif so far as it directed the sale of defendant 1's share in the mortgaged properties, that is, just as if Ex. H had been properly proved as a mortgage document, so far as defendant 1's share was concerned.

I am clear that the contesting defendants 2 and 3 did not dispute either the genuineness or the legal validity as mortgage documents of the deeds Exs. B, C and E to H before the District Munsif. So far as the suit document Ex. H is concerned, I think that O. 8, Rr. 3 to 5 (introduced into the new Civil Procedure Code) casting, as they do, the obligation on contesting defendants to make specific denials of facts alleged in the plaint and providing, as they do, that evasive denials are insufficient, precluded defendants 2 and 3 from raising the question that Ex. H did not create a valid mortgage or was not properly proved. Under S. 58, Evidence Aet, no fact need be proved which the parties have agreed to admit or which by any rule of pleading in force at the time, they are deemed to have admitted by their pleadings, though the Court may in its discretion require the facts admitted to be proved otherwise than by such admissions. The District Court is, no doubt, given a discretion under this section to require proof of these documents B, C and E to H, but, in my opinion, it would not have exercised its discretion properly if it called for such proof, notwithstanding what took place before the District Munsif. Assuming however that its discretion to call for proof would have been properly exercised, it did not call for such proof but decided at once that the documents had not been proved. The affidavits of three witnesses filed in this Court on behalf of the plaintiff establish that the District Munsif dispensed with the evidence, as the contesting defendants' vakil did not require formal proof of the documents Exs. B, C and E to H. I would therefore set aside the finding of the District Judge on issue 1 and hold that the suit document, Ex. H, is genuine and supported by consideration. I now come to issue 1, namely whether the debt is binding on defendants 2 and 3, assuming that the documents B, C and E to H are valid mortgage documents supported by consideration

The first document Ex. B was executed by defendant 1 to S. Koundan for Rupees 75 in 1891. Before the personal remedy under that document was barred, defendant 1 executed Ex. C (which superseded B) in 1895 for Rs. 115 to the same S. Koundan. Then Ex. E is a mortgage deed by defendant 1 to Chinnu Mudali in 1896 for Rs. 50. Ex. F is a mortgage deed executed in the year 1897 by defendant 1 to Palaniandi Chettiar for Rs. 400 to discharge Exs. C and E and for further sums borrowed. Ex. G is dated 1899 for Rs. 700 to discharge Ex. F and for moneys borrowed in cash and it was executed to the plaintiff Arumugam Chetty. Exs. J and K are simple debt bonds for Rs. 50 and Rs. 120 respectively dated in 1900 and 1902. Ex. K. superseding Ex. J The plaint document Ex. H was executed for Rs 1,150 due to the plaintiff partly under Ex. G (Rs. 833-8-0) (within six years of Ex. G), and partly under Ex. K (Rs. 130-1-0) (within three years of Ex. K) and partly under oral loans (Rs. 143) (total Rs. 1,106-9-0), the remaining Rs. 43-7-0 borrowed in cash on the date of Ex. H being disallowed by the District Munsif.

The District Judge has disallowed the plaintiff's claim against the shares of defendants 2 and 3 in respect of almost the whole of this entire amount of Rupees 1,106-9-0. He has allowed only the amount of Rs. 150-1-0 (due under the simple debt bond Ex. K) out of the above sum of Rs. 1,106-9-0. The District Judge's reason is that the term "antecedent debt", as explained in the Privy Council decision in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1), does not cover the debt due under Ex G (Rs. 833-8-0), and that the antecedent oral debts amounting to Rs. 143-1-0 are not proved. I have already held that defendants 2 and 3 did not deny and must be deemed to have admitted the existence of all the debts which made up the Rs. 1,106-9-0.

The learned District Judge does not explain why, according to the Privy Council decision in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1), the money due under the mortgage document Ex. G would not constitute an antecedent debt. Mr. Sitarama Rao who appeared for respondents 1 and 2 has however ably argued before us that according to that decision no debt secured by a mortgage of the ancestral family property would constitute "antecedent debt" of the father and that such a debt could not therefore support an alienation by the father so as to bind his sons' interests. It seems to be rather a startling proposition that while an antecedent debt of a simple character whether contracted orally or under a simple debt bond can support a subsequent mortgage or sale of the aons' share also in the ancestral property the fact that the antecedent creditor got the additional security of a mortgage deprives the subsequent alienee of the right given by the Hindu law to rely upon the antecedent character of the debt discharged by the consideration paid for his alienation. The point directly decided in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1) is that a loan contemproaneous with or just previous to the date of a mortgage transaction could not be treated as an antecedent debt as was erroneously held by Boddam and Bashyam Aiyangar, JJ., in Chidambara Mudaliar v. Koothaperumal (2), a view which had already been overruled by this Court in Venkataramanaya Pantulu v. Venkataramana Doss Pantulu (3). Mr. Sitarama Rao relies however on the following passages found in their Lordships' judgment:

"The law was thus stated by Lord Hobhouse in Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohun (4): Destructive as it may be of the principle of independent co-parcenary rights in the sons the decisions have for some time established the principle that the sons cannot set up their rights against their father's alienation for an antecedent debt if not tained with immorality. In their Lordships' opinions these expressions . . do not give any countenance to the idea that the joint family estate can be effectively sold or charged in such a manner as to bind the issue of the father except where the sale or charge has been made in order to discharge an obligation not only antecedently incurred but incurred wholly apart from the ownership of the joint estate or the security afforded or supposed to be available by such joint estate."

I think that having regard to the context, their Lordships only meant that if the so called antecedent debt is so shortly before the execution of the mortgage say two hours or two days, as to establish that it was incurred on the credit, or security available by the joint family immovable assets, such a debt is not an antecedent debt and the mortgage deed executed for such a so-called antecedent debt would not affect the sons' share. On the same (p. 447 of 39 All.) their Lordships say:

"to call a borrowing made on the occasion of the grant of a mortgage an antecedent debt is to extend unduly and improperly the whole scope of the exception on that topic."

At (p. 448 of 39 All.) their Lordships say:

"It is said that the transaction substantially is that the father got the Rs. 200 into his hands and that when he granted the mortgage he was accordingly an 'antecedent debtor. Their Lordships are of opinion that this contention cannot be upheld."

Thus their Lordships were only considering the question whether the debt incurred on the security of the mortgage was itself an antecedent debt so as to support that mortgage, and not whether a debt previously incurred which is really and substantially (and not in mere name and technically) a debt antecedent to the mortgage sued on could not be called an antecedent debt, when considering the validity of the latter security deed. The antecedent mortgage debt may not be able to support itself as a mortgage security as regards the sons' share secured under it, but that it ceases to be an antecedent debt so as to support the later alienation by mortgage is, as I said before, not only a startling proposition but seems to be devoid of any support from the language of their Lordships. In Peda Vekanna v. Sreenivasa Deekshatulu (5) my Lord the Chief Justice considered the above Privy Council decision in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1) and remarked as follows in answer to the argument that no suit could be brought during the lifetime of the father against the sons on a debt incurred by the father and which was neither illegal nor immoral:

"As to this, Lord Halsbury's well known observation in Quinn v. Leathem (6), that a case is only an authority for what it decides, and not for every proposition that may seem to follow logically from it, appears to me to apply with special force. That the Indian Courts have interpreted the earlier decisions ending with Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohun (4), in which last case it is stated that the sons cannot set up their rights against his creditor's remedies for their debts if not tainted with immorality, as authorizing suits for such debts against the son as well as the father may be seen, as regards Calcutta, from the Full Bench decision in Luchmun Dass v. Giridhur Chowdhry (7)."

and then my Lord proceeds to refer to other cases and finally holds that the Privy Council could not have meant to overrule all those decisions. Though the case of Peda Venkanna v. Sreenivasa Deekshatulu (5) did not raise the particular point now in question, I have referred to it to show that the language of their Lordships relied on by Mr. Sitaram Rao before us, namely "an obligation incurred wholly apart from the security afforded by the joint estate," refers to the obligation under the suit bond on which a particular suit is brought and which is sought to be treated as an antecedent debt and not a prior antecedent obligation of the father, though that prior obligation was accompanied by a charge on the joint estate. I might further add that as the father's personal liability under the prior obligation under Ex. G had not been barred on the date of the suit document Ex. H, there was in this case an obligation wholly apart from the security afforded by the joint estate which could form an antecedent debt and could be used as the foundation to support Ex. H to that extent, against the shares of the sons, even if their Lordships of the Privy Council intended by their language that a secured debt as such could never constitute an antecedent debt. While on principle the fact of the debt being barred on the personal covenant should make no difference, I have raised this point for consideration because, even if one is ultimately constrained by the language of their Lordships of the Privy Council to treat a debt which is altogether a mortgage debt as not being an antecedent debt, that doctrine (which, as I said before is to my mind a startling doctrine) may not be extended an inch beyond what is absolutely necessitated by their Lordships' language.

Mr. B. Sitaram Rao however relied upon the decision of Spencer and Krishnan, JJ., reported as Badagala Jogi Naidu v. Bendalam Papiah Naidu (8), where the learned Judges state that an antecedent debt which was also a mortgage debt could not be relied on as an antecedent debt to support the subsequent mortgage. I feel grave doubts as to whether the language of their Lordships of the Privy Council when interpreted with reference to the facts of the Privy Council case, was intended to lay down such a proposition, and as I have above tried to show, their Lordships were only dealing with the question whether a particular loan incurred on security of the joint estate and therefore not incurred wholly apart from the security afforded by the said joint estate would affect the sons' shares in the joint estate. Their Lordships were not considering at all the question whether if a really antecedent debt had also been accompanied by a mortgage security, it would or would not constitute as antecedent debt capable of supporting a subsequent alienation of the sons' shares by a mortgage bond executed for the discharge of that antecedent debt (and for fresh loans) so far as that antecedent debt was concerned. As however the question is an important one which must frequently occur and as my view is opposed to the decision of the Division Bench in Badagala Jogi Naidu v. Bandalam Papiah Naidu (8), I would refer the following questions for the decision of a Full Bench:

(1) Whether an independant debt, not immoral or illegal, contracted by the father on the security of the joint estate antecedent to the mortgage sued on can be treated as an antecedent debt so as to support the charge on the sons' shares also to the extent of the sums secured on the prior mortgage? (2) In such a case, can the former debt be treated as an antecedent debt for the purpose referred to if the personal liability of the father under the earlier mortgage is not barred on the date of the suit document?

Napier, J.—I entirely agree with my learned brother that it was not open to defendants 2 and 3 to take the point before the appellate Court that the mortgages A to H had not been proved. Their vakil did not deny the accuracy of the District Munsif's endorsement and his note as to the effect of the vakil's admission, and I am quite unable to understand why the District Judge did not give full effect to that admission. I must express my disapproval of the conduct of the vakil concerned in putting forward such a contention in the appellate Court after having invited the plaintiff not to prove the documents by the witnesses whom he had in attendance. On the question of law raised by Mr. Sitaram Rao, I agree with my learned brother that it should be referred to a Full Bench.

(8) [1918] 48 I. C. 289.

We have been much pressed with the language used by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case reported as Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1) and we have felt the same difficulty as was felt by the learned Chief Justice in Peda Venkanna v. Sreenivasa Deekshatulu (5). In that case the learned Chief Justice, applying the observation of Lord Halsbury in Quinn v. Leathem (6), declined to apply their Lordships' judgment to any proposition beyond that which arose in the case. The point actually decided was that a mortgage transaction by a father would bind his sons' shares during his lifetime only when the debt forming the consideration for the document was antecedent. No question is raised in this case before us which is at variance with that ruling.

We are asked however to apply the words on p. 447 (of I.L.R. 39 All.) "The exception being allowed, it appears to their Lordships to apply, and to apply to the case where the father's debts have been incurred irrespective of the credit obtainable from immovable assets that are joint family property", and to say that each prior mortgage in this case is wholly invalid as consideration for the later mortgage because its security depended on the joint family property. This proposition seems to me to entail a contradiction between their Lordships' decision and the supposed result of the dictum. Their Lordships clearly say that an existing antecedent debt not secured on a family property is good consideration for a mortgage of the family property. Clearly therefore if no further transaction was entered into, the mortgage would be binding on the family. It seems to me to be impossible to argue that, if subsequently the father finds it necessary to borrow another sum of money without security and then some time later creates a mortgage on the family property both for the old mortgage debt and the unsecured loan, that mortgage debt is not good consideration as against the sons on the ground that it was not incurred wholly apart from the ownership of the joint estate. I cannot understand how a debt that was once binding ceases to be binding by renewal.

My learned brother has raised the point that apart from the security, there is a personal liability in every mortgage and that therefore even though as a mortgage the antecedent debt might be bad, still as long as the personal remedy was not barred, the debt is a good antecedent debt apart from the mortgage security and can thus form consideration for the new mortgage binding on the sons. Speaking for myself, this distinction seems to me to be too artificial, but it has, if I may say so, the merit of meeting the difficulty raised on an extreme construction of their Lordships' language. I therefore agree with my learned brother that this do form part of our reference.

Opinion.

Wallis, C. J.—This reference raises the question whether the rule as to the validity of a father's alienation for an antecedent debt is inapplicable where the antecedent debt itself has been contracted on the security of the family property, as held in Badagala Jogi Naidu v. Bendalam Papiah Naidu (8), on the authority of certain observations of the Privy Council in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1). The question is of great importance owing to the far-reaching consequences of our decision and has received our anxious consideration. The appeal to the Privy Council was filed to challenge the decision of the majority of the Allahabad High Court in Chandra Deo Singh v. Mata Prasad (9), dissenting from the view taken in Khalilul Rahman v. Gobind Pershad (10) and Chidambara Mudaliar v. Koothaperumal (2) and agreeing with the later Madras decision in Venkataramanaya Pantulu v. Venkataramana Doss Pantulu (3), that there must be an antecedent debt to support the father's alienation. In their judgment disposing of this most controverted question their Lordships frequently referred with approval to the exhaustive judgment of Sir John Stanley, C. J., in the case first mentioned, and, even as will be shown, adopted his enunciation of the true rule as to antecedency in terms which, it is to be noted, do not contain the further restriction now contended for. We have next to consider the observations relied on in the judgment and the context in which they occur. Their Lordships in the course of their judgment had pointed out that the rule validating an alienation by the father for an antecedent debt of his own which was neither illegal nor immoral was an exception to the general rule of the Mitakshara which should not be extended, and, after referring to their earlier decisions and setting out the well known passage in Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohun (4) in which it is laid down that the sons cannot set up their rights against the father's alienation fo an antecedent debt, they proceeded tor observe: "In their Lordships' opinion these expressions, which have been the subject of so much difference of legal opinion, do not give any countenance to the idea that the joint family estate can be effectively sold or charged in such a manner as to bind the issue of the father, except where the saie or charge has been made in order to discharge an obligation not only antecedently incurred, but incurred wholly apart from the ownership of the joint estate or the security afforded or supposed to be available by such joint estate. The exception being allowed, as in the state of the authorities it must be, it appears to their Lordships to apply, and to apply, to the case where the father's debts have been incurred irrespective of the credit obtainable from immovable assets which do not personally belong to him but are joint family property. In their view of the rights of a father and his creditors, if the principle were extended further, then the exception would be made so wide as in effect to extinguish the sound and wholesome principle itself, namely, that no manager, guardian, or trustee can be entitled for his own purposes to dispose of the estate which is under his charge. In short, it may be said that the rule of this part of the Mitakshara law is that the joint family estate is in this position: under his management he can neither obtain money for his own purposes for it, nor can he obtain money for his own purposes upon it. To permit him to do so would enable him to sacrifice those rights which he was bound to conserve. This would be equivalent to sanctioning a plain and, it might be, a deliberate breach of trust. The Mitakshara law does not warrant or legalize any such transaction. The limits of the principle of the exception have been thus set forth because in their Lordships' opinion they form a guide to the settlement of the conflict of authority in India on the subject of antecedent debt."

It is very important to observe that their Lordships expressly say that they are only laying down the true principle for their guidance in the decision of the point before them, and this, I think, goes to show that they did not intend to decide anything else, as for instance, the application of that principle to cases which were not before them. If they intended to go further their observations were made obiter and are not binding on us as authority. In the rest of their judgment they strictly confined themselves to the decision of the question before them, the necessity that the debt should be antecedent, and in answering this question they adopted the language of Sir John Stanley in Chandra Deo Singh v. Mata Prasad (9):

"The true rule is that a son cannot impeach an alienation of ancestral joint family property made by the father, for which the consideration is an antecedent debt of the father not tainted with immorality or the object of which is to pay such a debt . . . the doctrine has no application to a case in which no antecedent debt of the father, that is, a debt antecedent to the alienation in question, is concerned as the consideration or object of the alienation."

As already observed, there is no mention in this rule of the further restriction now contended for. Their Lordships went on to deal with the argument that the antecedency might be only of an hour or a day or a year, and observed that there must, to give true effect to the doctrine of antecedency in time, be also real dissociation in fact, and that the Courts would not be slow to deny effect to the mortgage where the antecedency was found to be unreal and to be merely a cover for what was essentially a breach of trust. These observations were strictly germane to the question as to the necessity of a real antecedency in fact, but they do not cover the further proposition that the antecedent debt must be one which was not incurred on the security of the joint family property. In the passage already cited their Lordships did, in my opinion, lay down that in principle there should be such a further restriction, and they proceeded to decide the only question before them in accordance with the principle so laid down. They do not refer to any earlier case in which this further restriction had been laid down or even suggested, and possibly they were led to state the principle in these terms for the purpose in hand with reference to the considerations urged by Sir John Stanley in contesting the opinion expressed by Boddam and Bhashyam

Aiyangar, JJ. in Chidambara Mudaliar v. Kootha perumal (2), that to insist on the debt being antecedent would not really afford any protection to the son. Those learned Judges observed in Chidambara Mudaliar v. Kootha perumal (2):

"On principle it is difficult to make any distinction between a mortgage given for an antecedent debt and a mortgage given for a debt then incurred, for in either case the debt is binding upon the son, and the enforcement of the security exonerates the son from the burden of the father's debt. Such a distinction does not really afford any protection to the son: for his share in the mortgaged property can, as a general rule, be seized and brought to sale, even in the latter case, for the recovery of the debt as a personal debt due by the father (though also secured by a mortgage), unless such share has been validly alienated in favour of a third party, since the date of the mortgage but prior to its attachment."

The learned Judges who overruled this decision in Venkataramanaya Pantulu v. Venkataramana Doss Pantulu (3) did not apparently differ in principle from this statement but considered themselves bound by authority to hold that the debt must in fact be antecedent. It was however contested by Sir John Stanley in Chandra Deo Singh v. Mata Prasad (9), in the judgment already mentioned, at p. 202 (of 31 All.).

"This observation is plausible, but it is capable, I think, of ready refutation. The remedy of the creditor on the basis of the son's pious duty is not co-extensive with his remedy on foot of a binding security. In principle the statement is opposed to the rule of the Mitakshara. In practice it would not be correct, inasmuch as the observance of the rule of the Mitakshara does afford some protection to the interests of sons. The greed which exists for the acquisition of landed property in this province is well known. Money-lenders are ever ready to advance money to thriftless or extravagant landowners on the security of their landed property with a view to the ultimate acquisition of the property. Interest is allowed to accumulate until the mortgage debt has reached such dimensions that it is unlikely that the owner can redeem. Then a suit for sale is instituted on foot of the security, the mortgagee gets leave to bid and buys and the family loses its ancestral property. Money-lenders are chary of making large advances to landowners on personal security. Now if in negotiations for a loan on a mortgage, lenders are obliged to make inquiry and satisfy themselves that the loan is required to meet a legal necessity, this will afford some protection to the other members of the co-parcenary body. If a father in a joint Mitakshara family can borrow money on the security of the joint ancestral estate to satisfy any extravagant whim or fancy he may form, it is obvious that the rule of the Mitakshara is a dead letter and that the other members of the family are robbed of all protection."

Their Lordships, I cannot help thinking, were influenced by these forcible observations in laying down the principle in the way they did. It is however clear, I think, that Sir John Stanley did not intend to lay down that there was any necessity to show that the debt was not only antecedent but also not incurred on the security of the family property, because he does not lay down any such restriction in formulating the rule, and because he refers with approval to the decision of the Full Court in Badri Prasad v. Madan Lal (11). In that case the mortgage in question was executed in satisfaction of a prior mortgage debt incurred by the father to the same mortgagee. It was contended the alienation was bad because the mortgage was effected in discharge of the mortgagee's own prior debt and was therefore not an antecedent debt within the meaning of the rule. Sir John Edge, C. J., with whom the other Judges concurred, rejected this contention, and, after citing a Calcutta ruling that the purchase money itself which was the consideration for a conveyance could not be said to be an antecedent debt—the point now decided by their Lordships—added: "I know of no other restriction of the term 'antecedent debt'." This statement is equally true of the other Courts and of the legal profession and the public in India. The doctrine of the father's power of alienation for his own debt having been repeatedly enunciated for over 60 years, ever since its recognition by the Privy Council in Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mt. Babooee Munraj (12), without any such restriction have been suggested, it has been assumed not to exist.

The only question was whether it was necessary that there should be any antecedent debt at all, and numberless transactions have taken place on that footing which, as has been represented to us, it would involve great hardship to disturb. Observations in judgments must be read with reference to the context and to the pre-existing law, and the very recent decision in Nachiyappa Goundan v. Rangasami Goundan, as yet unreported contains an express warning against deducing from particular expressions in their Lordships' judgments novel propositions unsupported either by principles or authority, and against construing decisions putting an end to a conflict of authority on a particular question as unsettling what till then had been treated as settled. However sound in principle, and however applicable to this Presidency with reference to the son's shares, if not to the father's, the suggested restriction might be if the matter were res integra, it would certainly be a novel proposition unsupported by any previous authority to lay down at the present time that an alienation for an antecedent debt not otherwise open to objection was invalid because the antecedent debt was incurred on the security of the joint family property. Having regard to their Lordships' express statement that the enunciation of the principle in these terms was intended as a guide to the decision of the controverted question before them, I do not think we should be warranted in extending its application to a case which was not before them and involves considerations which are not referred to in their judgment, especially when such an application of the principle would have the effect of disturbing what has long been regarded as settled law, and would give rise to great uncertainty as to existing titles.

I would answer the first question in the affirmative. It is unnecessary to answer the second question.

Oldfield, J.—I entirely agree.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—In the reference to the Full Bench I said that their Lordships of the Privy Council in some passages of their judgment in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1) used language which, if widely interpreted, would make a mortgage debt which was genuinely antecedent to the alienation in suit not an antecedent debt capable of supporting such an alienation by the father as against the son's share. Having regard however (a) to the context, (b) to the particular question which their Lordships had and intended to decide and (c) the language used by them in several passages; both before and after the widely worded passages, I was inclined to hold that their Lordships were considering even in these passages only the case where the so-called antecedent debt was really and substantially the mortgage debt sued on. For instance, in the passage

" the exception * * * appears to their Lordships to apply only to the case where the father's debts have been incurred irrespective of the credit obtainable from immovable assets which are joint family property", their Lordships were approving of the exception which allows a decree for sale to be passed in the suit brought for a mortgage debt of the father if incurred for discharging the father's antecedent debts, and they disapproved its extension to a case where the mortgage deed sued on was executed for a so-called antecedent personal debt which was really incurred on the "credit obtainable" from the family lands and which antecedent debt was therefore at once or soon afterwards merged in the mortgage alienation sued upon. The question whether genuinely antecedent debts might be or might not be themselves mortgage debts, and whether they ought to be only simple debts, was not, in my opinion, decided or intended to be decided by their Lordships. I did not and do not think that their Lordships intended to adopt all the reasoning given in Sir John Stanley's C. J's judgment in Chandra Deo Singh v. Mata Prasad (9) They, no doubt fully approved of the dicta of the learned Chief Justice quoted at pp. 446 and 449 (of 39 All.), but those dicta do not deal with the question whether a really antecedent mortgage debt was one which could support a later alienation against the sons. Having heard full arguments again sitting in the Full Bench and having had the advantage of studying the judgment of my Lord the Chief Justice just now pronounced and concurred in by Oldfield, J., I must frankly admit that I have felt much diffidence as to the soundness of my view as to the real meaning of their Lordships' language in the disputed passages. While I had to respectfully differ in my referring order from the opinions of two learned Judges of this Court [Spencer and Krishnan, JJ., in Badagala Jogi Naidu v. Bendalan Papiah Naidu (8)] as to the interpretation of those passages, I now find that my opinion is also opposed to the opinions of my Lord and Oldfield, J., besides the opinions of two learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court (Tudball and Rafique, JJ.) in Brij Narain Rai v. Mangla Prasad (13). However after the best consideration I have been able to give to the question, I shall adhere to the view I have already expressed.

(13) [1919] 41 All. 235=50 I. C. 101.

I have fortified my mind to arrive at this conclusion by the following further considerations: (a) The opinion of Sir John Edge, C. J. [who took part in the Privy Council decision in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1)] as found in the judgment in Badri Prasad v. Madan Lal (11) referred to in my Lord's judgment supports my view of the law: (b) since Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mt Babooee Munraj (12), the uniform course of decisions, so far as I know in all the High Courts, has been to treat a really antecedent mortgage debt on the same level with a really antecedent simple debt for the purpose of supporting a subsequent alienation against the son's share: (c) their Lordships have omitted in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1) to expressly refer to and overrule this settled law: (d) the unsettlement of numerous titles to large estates and the great uncertainty in the law which would result if we decide the question: (1) referred to the Full Bench in the negative is also a matter for serious thought: (e) the old Hindu law enacted (see Yagnavalkaya II, 50, and Colebrook's Digest, Vol. I, p. 190, which quotes Katyayana's text) that it was the pious duty of the sons to pay their father's debt (e-1) even with interest (but the interest amount should not exceed the principal amount), (e 2) even if it was barred by limitation according to modern Statutes (e-3) and even if no ancestral assets were inherited by the sons, provided the sons were capable of bearing the burden.

The obligation was restricted afterwards as regards (e-2) and (e-3) by statutory enactment and judicial decisions, but judicial decisions have explained and expanded the nature and legal results of the obligation as regards (e-1): (1) by not restricting the amount of interest allowable to to the creditor to the amount of the principal, (2) by making the future pious duty a present legal liability, and (3) by making a voluntary alienation by the father for such antecedent debt binding on the sons' shares under the Mitakshara law, (under the order Hindu law of Manu the sons had no interest or shares at all during their father's lifetime); and (4) by making involuntary alienations by Court sales in execution of a decree against the father alone to affect the sons' shares also: and (f) in the old Hindu law texts relating to the son's pious obligation which form the foundation on which the present law has been broadened from precedent to precedent, there is no distinction made between a mortgage debt and a personal debt of the father. In the result I concur in answering the first question referred to this Full Bench in the affirmative.

Coutts-Trotter, J.—I have had the advantage of perusing the opinion just pronounced by my Lord, and I entirely concur in it.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—My answer to the first question is in the affirmative. No cases have been quoted before us in which it has been directly held that a debt secured by a mortgage could not constitute an antecedent debt. Mr. Sitarama Rao naturally relied upon the observations of Lord Shaw at p. 447 (of I. L. R. 39 All) in Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (1) which is as follows:

"Except where the sale or charge has been made in order to discharge an obligation not only antecedently incurred, but incurred wholly apart from the ownership of the joint estate or the security afforded or supposed to be available by such joint estate."

With reference to this sentence, it was contended that there was a distinct pronuncement that if a debt was advanced on the security of the property in the possession or control of the manager of a Hindu family, such a debt would have been incurred in breach of trust and that consequently it cannot constitute an antecedent debt. It was further argued that there was an essential difference between a simple loan and a loan charging the family property. The sentence in the judgment,

"under his management he can neither obtain money for his own purposes for it, nor can he obtain money for his own purposes upon it."

was relied on for this argument. I cannot say that these contentions are entirely unfounded Before dealing with these sentences, I think it expedient to consider the judgment as a whole. The case before the Board was one in which a suit was brought upon a mortgage document. This deed was not a renewal of an old document. The question for consideration before the Board was whether the loan advanced was contemporaneous with or was antecedent to the mortgage sued on. In considering this question their Lordships of the Judicial Committee had before them the rulings of the various High Courts in which they point out:

"there was a conflict which occurs, not merely between the Courts of one district in India and another, but also between decisions pronounced in Calcutta itself, in Allahabad itself, and in Madras itself.

This conflict they wanted to put an end to. If we examine the case which were cited before them as typical of the conflict, it would be seen that in not one of them was the question, whether a subsequent mortgage superseding an earlier mortgage could constitute an antecedent debt ever raised or decided. The point at issue in them was whether there should not be a debt really antecedent to the one on which the suit was brought or whether it was enough if a short time had elapsed between the execution of the document and the granting of the loan. Nor do I find any reference in the argument of the learned counsel before the Judicial Committee to this point. Under these circumstances I do not think that the language relied on should be regarded as a considered pronouncement upon the matter which we have to decide.

Further, if we analyze the judgment of Lord Shaw it is clear that the proposition contended for by the learned vakil would be to some extent inconsistent with the general principles enunciated by the noble Lord. The judgment first traces the rights of interdiction of the subordinate members of a Hindu family to the well-known text of Mitakshara (Ch. 1, S. 1, pl. 27). Then it proceeds to point out that the Mitakshara has enunciated a rule in favour of the managing co-parceners. The reason of the rule is stated to be that wherever there is a family necessity it is "one binding upon the co-parceners as a whole and that consequently the consent of all of them can be implied even though they may not be consulted individually."

The judgment then considers the exception to the general rule, which is stated to have "arisen from the necessity of protecting the rights of third persons, say, the purchasers of the property who have taken their title for onerous consideration and in good faith."

Although in the previous sentence it was stated that:

"The exception should be very carefully guarded and should not be extended,"

it is clear that the aim of the exception, in the opinion of the Board, was to safeguard the rights of bona fide lenders, and not of the subordinate members of the Hindu family. Then we have a discussion as to how this exception should be worked. The observations of Knight Bruce, L. J., Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mt. Babooee Munraj (12) are quoted as showing that if

"the fact of the advance is proved, the presumption of law is prima facie to support the charge and the onus of disproving it rests on the heir."

Up to this point there is no discussion as to whether the debt should be a simple debt or a debt secured upon the charge on property. After this, the particular facts of the case are examined and the rules deduced by Sir James Colvile in Suraj Bansi Koer v. Sheo Persad Singh (14) and Girdhari Lall v. Kantoo Lall (15) are stated. Then follows an approval of the comment by Sir John Stanley in Chandra Deo Singh v. Mata Prasad (9) on the above two decisions. If we turn to the judgment of the learned Chief Justice of the Allahabad High Court which has secured the approval of the Judicial Committee, it would be clear that there was no intention in that case to differentiate between simple debts and mortgage debts. On the other hand the sentence at the bottom of page 207 (of 31 All) is in favour of holding that a mortgage is as much within the competency of the manager as a simple debt. Then the judgment of the Judicial Committee proceeds to define what an antecedent debt is. It is in this part of the judgment that the observation relied on by Mr. Sitarama Rao occurs. But the quotation from Lord Hobhouse'e judgment in Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohan (4), on which the rule is based, does not make any distinction between mortgage debts and money debts; and the final deduction of the Board does not warrant any such distinction being drawn between the two classes of debts. The sentences relied on, namely:

"in short, it may be said that the rule of this part of the Mitakshara Law is that the joint family, estate is in this position: under his management he can neither obtain money for his own purposes for it nor can he obtain money for his own purposes upon it. To permit him to do so would enable him to sacrifice those rights which he was bound to conserve," should be read as referring to the creation of the first obligation and not to the merger of the first debt in a subsequent mortgage debt. That was the only matter which was directly discussed, and this and the other observations must be taken to have been made with reference to the enforcibility of a debt which starts with a mortgage and is not subsequently absorbed in any other transaction of a similar or a different kind. The rule finally laid down, namely that "there must be antecedency in time" and "real dissociation in fact", would equally apply to a simple and to a mortgage debt. I have very closely read the judgment of the Board, and in my opinion the particular passage on which so much stress was laid should not be construed in the way in which the learned vakil asked us to construe it. In this connexion I may be permitted to draw attention to what Lord Haldane said in Cornelius v. Phillips (16):

"Dicta by Judges, however eminent, ought not to be cited as establishing authoritatively propositions of law unless these dicta really form integral parts of the train of reasoning directed to the real question decided. They may, if they occur merely at large, be valuable for edification, but they are not binding."

Mr Sitarama Rao contended that the Judicial Committee have set to themselves the task of laying down the law and it is not open to us to minimize its effect by saying that the sentences relied on are mere obiter dicta. The answer is that their Lordships had not before them this aspect of the case at all. Ever since Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mt Babooee Munraj (12) in which the rule as to antecedent debt was outlined, numerous cases have been decided in this Presidency and elsewhere, where it was assumed as unquestionable that there is no distinction between a simple and a mortgage debt. It would unsettle vested rights and throw open the flood gates of litigation, if their Lordships are to be understood as laying down the law as contended for by the learned vakil. There must be some semblance of discussion in the judgment appealed against, in the argument of counsel or in the cases quoted at the Bar to warrant us in imputing such an unexpected departure from accepted notions on the subject to their Lordships. The Judicial Committee are in the habit of cautioning Court in India to apply the old decisions to transactions founded on an exploded view of law and to suggesting that as and from a particular date the new pronouncement should be accepted as regulating similar transactions. In Pattabiramier v. Venkata Rao (17) and Thambuswami Pillai v. Sriramulu Naidu (18) relating to the construction of mortgages by conditional sale, this hint was given. Again in dealing with rights of alienation which a co-parcener has in respect of his own share, the Board, while saying that the Madras view was not right, refused to interfere with it on the principle of stare decisis. There is no indication of such an attitude in the present case. The truth is that their Lordships did not intend to overrule the principle which had gained uncontested currency all these years. I cannot therefore but regard the view taken in Brij Narain Rai v. Mangla Prasad (13) and by Spencer and Krishnan JJ., in this Court as attempts to be meticulously literal at the expense of the spirit of the pronouncement.

I may draw attention to the fact that the Judicial Committee have held in Girdhari Lall v. Kantoo Lall (15) that where family property has been sold away under a mortgage decree, the sons can recover it back only on showing that the debt was illegal or immoral. The same conclusion has been stated in cases where the property passed out of the family by sale under a money decree. No distinction is drawn regarding the rights of the sons in these two classes of cases. If it was breach of trust on the part of the manager to have mortgaged the property, why should the suing co-parcener show that there was immorality or illegality? If the property passed out of the family in violation of a trust, the son should, on pleading, without more, that the decree under which the sale was held was founded on a mortgage, be decreed possession of at least his share. There is a consideration which is specially applicable to Madras and which would also lead to the same result. In the judgment under consideration, the Board had to consider the rule of the Mitakshara as administered in Allahabad. They had not before them the doctrine which has been uniformly accepted in this Presidency that for a debt of the father which is neither illegal nor immoral, his share in the family property would be liable. This view has obtained the sanction of the Judicial Committee on the principle of stare decisis. It would follow from this that if a father mortgages property for a debt which is not tainted with illegality or immorality, although not binding on the sons as not being for family benefit or necessity, it would be enforcible against the sons on the doctrine of their pious obligation to discharge their father's debt. This would furnish an additional ground for holding that a mortgage debt, instead of being in a worse position than a simple debt, is in some respects in a more favourable position. There is one observation in the judgment which I have so largely quoted from, which lends support to my view. Almost the last sentence in the judgment is:

"Wherever such antecedency is found to be unreal and is merely a cover for what is essentially a breach of trust, the Courts will not be slow to deny effect to a mortgage so brought into existence."

There is no qualification here that the illusory character would only affect a simple debt. What the Courts in India are asked to do is to find out whether the previous loan was real or illusory, and not whether it is a simple debt or a mortgage debt. For all these reasons I am of opinion that Badagala Jogi Naidu v. Bendalam Papiah Naidu (8) was wrongly decided. It is not necessary to express any opinion upon the second question referred to us.

ABDUR RAHIM AND SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.J.

Cheruthazath Abdulla Haji —Defendant—Appellant.

v.

Cheriyandi Ibrayan Kutti and others —Plaintiff and Defendants—Respondents.

Appeal Suit No. 138 of 1917, Decided on 9th April 1918.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, R. 59—Suit by unsuccessful claimant for declaration of his title as mortgagee from judgment-debtors and for cancellation of order dismissing his claim as fraud on creditors mortgage not previously avioded—Judgment-debtor cannot resist suit on ground that mortgage was fraud on creditors—T. P. Act (1882), S. 53.

Where an unsuccessful intervenor in claim proceedings institutes a suit under O. 21, R. 63, Civil P. C., for declaration of his title as mortgagee from the judgment-debtor and for the cancellation of the summary order dismissing his claim as a fraud on creditors, it is not open to the judgment-creditor to resist the plaintiff's suit on the ground that the mortgage to the plaintiff was a fraud on the creditors of the mortgagor, unless the mortgage has been previously avoided by the creditor in a properly instituted suit.

Section 53, T. P. Act, cannot be pleaded merely as a defence: a suit has to be instituted by the creditor whose rights are effected by the transaction to have it set aside. Until then no defence founded on the section can be pleaded: 43 I. C. 651, and 34 I. C. 778; Foll. [P 88 C 2 P 89 C 1]

(b) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 53—All transactions whether sham or intended to create title are within mischief of S. 53 if their effect is to defeat or defraud creditors—Sham transaction — Suit to cancel order passed adversely in execution proceedings—Defendant can plead that plaintiff cannot maintain suit he being only screen for real owner—Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, R. 63.

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J—All transactions, whether they are sham or are intended to secure some interest in the property, are within the mischief of S. 53 if their effect is to defeat or defraud creditors. In some of them there may be no intention at all that the transferee should have any interest in the property. Such transactions are generally known as sham or colourable transactions. In other cases, e. g., gifts to relations or sales for inadequate consideration, there may be an intention to transfer the property, but the effect of the transfer would be to defeat or delay creditors. Both classes of cases are within the purview of S. 53. In the case of sham transactions the defendant can plead in a suit by a person seeking to cancel an order passed adversely to him in an execution proceeding, that the plaintiff has no locus standi to maintain the suit as he is only as screen for the real owner [P 89 C 2]

K. P. M. Menon—for Appellant.

Narayana Aiyar—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—Defendants 1 and 2 were doing some business and got into embarrassed circumstances about the date of the transaction in question. That transaction is a mortgage of Rs. 5,000 executed by defendant 2 on certain properties belonging to him in favour of the plaintiff, respondent, 1 before us. Defendant 5 in the suit, the appellant in this appeal, is a purchaser of some of the properties at a sale held in execution of decrees obtained against defendant 2 by defendants 3 and 4. The plaintiff preferred a claim before the executing Court and that Court held in favour of the appellant. The finding of the executing Court was that the mortgage was a colourable transaction intended to save defendants 2,s private properties in the calamity that was in view. The plaintiff has filed the present suit in order to have it declared that the mortgage is a valid and binding transaction and that the sale to defendant 5 is valid only subject to this mortgage. The order of the Court executing the decree would have the effect under the Civil Procedure Code of concluding the rights of the parties if no suit was instituted. The main question which was tried before the learned District Judge was set forth in issues 4, 5 and 6. I think, all taken together, they were meant to raise the question whether the mortgage in question was invalid, having been executed to defeat or delay the creditors of defendant 2. That is the exact language of issue 4. Issue 5 raises a more particular question, whether the plaintiff was a transferee in good faith and for consideration. Issue 6 says: "Whether the kanom deed is valid and binding on defendants 3 and 4?" The evidence bearing on the point is fully treated in the judgment of the Acting District Judge and his conclusion is, whatever motives might have led the plaintiff into the transaction, the mortgage was not void for want of consideration. He seems inclined to find that at least Rs. 2,800 were paid for Ex. A, if not more. But it is not necessary to express any opinion on the question of fact whether any consideration passed between the parties and if so, what was the amount advanced by the plaintiff. The whole case of the contesting defendant was that the transaction was entered into for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of defendant 2 and was invalid on that ground. That is what is expressly stated in paras. 3 and 4, of the written statement of defendant 3 and defendant 5's written statement also is to the same effect. The Issues, as I have already stated also raise the same question, that is, in effect, whether the transaction was one which came within the purview of S. 53, T. P. Act. No doubt the District Judge, in para. 9 of his judgment, states:

"The form of these issues (issues 5 and 6) appears to be due to the fact that, when they were framed, it was not clear that, as decided in Palaniandi Chetti v. Appavu Chettiar (1), the question, whether the mortgage was voidable under S. 53, T. P. Act, did not arise and the only question was, whether it was void."

If the transaction came within the purview of S. 53 at all, then whether it was called void or voidable would not make any difference, if by "void" is meant, as apparently it was intended by the parties to mean, a transaction for which there was no consideration. S. 53, T. P. Act, says:

"Every transfer of immovable property, made with intent to defraud prior or subsequent transferees thereof for consideration, or co-owners or other persons having an interest in such property or to defeat or delay the creditors of the transferor, is voidable at the option of any person so defrauded, defeated or delayed. Where the effect of any transfer of immovable property is to defraud, defeat or delay any such person, and such transfer is made gratuitously or for grossly inadequate consideration, the transfer may be presumed to have been made with such intent as aforesaid."

Now the evidence on which the learned counsel for the appellant relied would, if believed, show that it was a transaction, the object of which was to defeat the creditors of defendant 2. Defendant 2 was in embarrassed circumstances at the time, the plaintiff was a close relation of his, and if the allegations of defendant 5 are well founded it might well be that the transaction was entered into with the intention of defeating the creditors of defendant 2. That was the case put forward by the appellant. But then Mr. Menon has argued for the appellant that the transaction was a "sham" and that if it is a sham, it does not come within the purview of S. 53, T. P. Act. He says that it was merely a piece of paper got up by the parties and there was no intention to give effect to it at all in any way. No doubt if it was only a paper got up simply for amusement's sake S. 53 will not apply. But that is not the case of Mr. Menon's client. His case is that there was a very serious intention in fact for executing Ex. A, and that was to defeat defendant 2's creditors. It is clear that effect was intended to be given to it, if not between defendant 2 and the plaintiff, at least so far as the claims of defendant 2's creditors are concerned, and that is just the case which is covered by S. 53, T. P. Act. Whether we call that a sham transaction or void, it does not make the slightest difference. The legislature calls it voidable, because until it is set aside it has certain legal consequences.

If that was the nature of the transaction as was the case of the defence, the Full Bench ruling of this Court reported in Subramania Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2), to which my learned brother was a party, stands in the way of the appellant. It decides:

"Where an unsuccessful intervenor in claim proceedings institutes a suit under O. 21, R. 63, Civil P. C., for declaration of his title as vendee from the judgment-debtor and for cancellation of the summary order dismissing his claim it is not open to the judgment-creditor (defendant) to resist the plaintiff's suit on the ground that the sale to the plaintiff was a fraud on the creditors

(1) [1916] 34 I. C. 778.

(2) [1918] 41 Mad. 612=43 I. C. 651 (F. B.)

of the vendor, unless the transfer had been previously avoided by the creditor in a properly instituted suit;"

that is to say, S. 53 cannot be pleaded merely as a defence: a suit has to be instituted by the creditor whose rights are affected by the transaction to have that transaction set aside. Until then, no defence founded on S. 53 can be pleaded. That is exactly this case, except that here we are concerned with a mortgage instead of a sale which, it is not suggested, can make any difference. The Full Bench decision followed another decision of my learned brother sitting in a Division Bench reported in Palaniandi Chetti v. Appavu Chettiar (1). Mr. Menon strongy urged upon us that the Full Bench ruling required reconsideration, and has referred to several decisions bearing upon the question which he says were not placed before the Full Bench. One of the cases directly bearing on the point is a decision of the Calcutta High Court reported in Abdul Kadar v. Ali Miah (3). There it was held that "voidable at the option" does not mean that there must be a suit instituted in order to set aside the transaction; it is open to a person who has a right to avoid a transaction within the meaning of S. 53 to avoid it by any act manifesting his intention, and it need not necessarily be done by a suit. He has also referred to the ruling of the Privy Council in Bijoy Gopal Mukerji v. Krishna Mahishi Debi (4) and has relied on the observation contained in a passage of the judgment of their Lordships at p. 333 where they say that, when a transaction is voidable, it may be avoided at the option of the party affected by it.

The ruling in Muthukumara Chetti v. Anthony Udayar (5) of a Division Bench of this Court is to a similar effect. Then Mr. Menon points out that there had been a number of decisions of this Court which were directly opposed to the ruling of the Full Bench in Subramania Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2). Some of those cases are referred to in the judgment of my learned brother in Palaniandi Chetti v. Appavu Chettiar (1). It is also pointed out that the language of S. 53, T. P. Act, does not in any way imply that a suit has to be instituted to set aside the transaction if it is sought to be avoided by the creditor or creditors affected by it. No doubt the view of the law propounded in the Full Bench decision may lead to complications and difficulties, as in this case. Supposing the transaction to have been designed to defeat creditors, the appellant who is prejudicially affected by it cannot plead this as a defence; the respondent-plaintiff's suit has to be decreed and the order of the executing Court nullified, the appellant being obliged to institute a suit to have the transaction set aside, although the order of the executing Court is in his favour. In fact there is great force in Mr. Menon's argument that in such cases the proceedings before the executing Court would become more or less illusory. I must say that if the matter were res integra, I should have been inclined very seriously to consider the whole question. But my learned brother, who has been a party to both the cases cited above, adheres to his view, and I feel myself entirely bound by the Full Bench decision.

The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs of respondent 1.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—I entirely agree with my learned brother that in the circumstances of this case the transaction must be deemed to be one in which the parties intended that an interest should be secured to the plaintiff in the property mortgaged to him. Defendant 5, in his written statement, apparently understood the transaction in that light. Therefore it is not open to the learned counsel for the appellant now to say that this was a case of a sham transaction altogether. I think it however desirable to remove certain misconceptions regarding the effect of the Full Bench decision in Subramania Aiyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2). All transactions, whether they are sham or are intended to secure some interest in the property, are within the mischief of S. 53, T. P. Act, if their effect is to defeat or defraud creditors. In some of them there may be no intention at all that the transferee should have any interest in the property. Such transactions are generally known as sham or colourable transactions. In other cases, e. g. gifts to relations or sales for inadequate consideration, there may be an intention to transfer the property, but the effect of the transfer would be to defeat or delay creditors. Therefore both classes of cases are within the purview of S. 53, T. P. Act. The essential difference between a sham transaction and the transaction of the other class which I have just now mentioned as affecting the position of the defendant in a suit is this: in the case of a sham transaction, where there is no intention to transfer property, the defendant can answer a person who comes into Court to set aside the adverse order passed in execution proceedings:

(5) A. I. R. 1915 Mad. 296 = 24 I. C. 120= 38 Mad. 367.

"You have no locus standi to bring the suit, because you have no interest in the property as nothing has been secured to you by the transfer. You are only a screen for the real owner and therefore you have no right to bring the suit."

That is the reason which actuated me at any rate when I consented to an issue being remitted in the case in Palaniandi Chetti v. Appavu Chettiar (1). We wanted to ascertain in that case whether the plaintiff who brought the suit had any interest which enabled him to contest the position of the defendant. I think it necessary to draw attention to this aspect of the case, because a great many misconceptions have grown round the Full Bench decision in Subramania Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2) and round the decision in Palaniandi Chetti v Appavu Chettiar (1). Now Mr. Menon has asked us to reconsider the decision in the Full Bench case. He has quoted a large number of cases and he says he has not quoted the whole list of cases bearing on the point. Let us take it that he has quoted the best of those he has collected. I shall first take Abdul Kadar v. Ali Miah (3), a decision of two Judges of the Calcutta High Court, which is directly in point. It is permissible to point out that the learned Judges seem to have ignored the observations of Mookerji, J., in Hakim Lal v. Mooshar Sahu (6), which decision was confirmed by the Privy Council in Musahar Sahu v. Lala Hakim Lal (7); they seem to have ignored also the decision in Chatterput Singh v. Maharaj Bahadur (8). They have not referred to the opinion of Telang, J., in Burjorji Dorabji Patel v. Dhunbai (9) which directly touches this point, and to another decision of Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J., a very high authority, in Ishwar Timappa v. Devar Venkappa Shanbog (10), in which the learned Judge has held that, without bringing a suit, it is not open to a defendant to plead that the transaction is invalid. No doubt there are some cases in Madras the other way, but the point we are now discussing was not directly raised in them. Mr. Menon has asked us to say that because of these decisions the matter should be referred to a Full Bench of five Judges. It is clear that a matter which has not been considered directly should not be regarded as an authority. Take the latest decision of the Judicial Committee. The Judicial Committee had been allowing appeals under the Land Acquisition Act for any number of years, and when their attention was drawn to S. 54, Land Acquisition Act, they put an end to the practice and refused to allow further appeals under the Act for a number of years, the view apparently being that if the matter was not considered directly, the decision should not be regarded as binding on Courts. It is only where the matter has been debated by counsel at the Bar, and where a considered judgment has been given, that counsel is entitled to say that that decision has not been considered. For these reasons I am of opinion that nothing that has been said this evening by Mr. Menon has in any way shaken my opinion regarding the soundness of the decisions in Palaniandi Chetti v. Appavu Chettiar (1) and in Subramania Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2). I adhere to them. In my opinion there will be no difficulty in giving effect to them.

There is one matter to which my learned brother has drawn attention. It is a very serious matter, and I think it requires further consideration. For example, the person in whose favour an order has been passed is in the unfortunate position of not being able to defend that order in the suit. No doubt, that is a serious position. But there are other difficulties the other way. Any number of persons may raise similar defences in different suits by a person to whom property has been transferred. They may be in different Courts. There may be different decisions, one holding that the transaction is an honest one, another that it is a sham one and a third that it is for inadequate consideration. In order to avoid multiplicity of proceedings, and in order to avoid possible divergence of judicial opinion, it has been ruled by Mookerjee, J., in Hakim Lal v. Mushahar Sahu (6), following Chatterput Singh v. Maharaj Bahadur (8), that there should be one suit like an administration suit in which the matter should be directly put in issue, and it should be open to appeal and second appeal. No doubt the difficulties pointed out by my learned brother are of a very serious character, but the other difficulties outweigh them. I am therefore of opinion that the decisions to which I was a party should be adhered to. I agree in the order proposed by my learned brother.

Judgment.—A preliminary objection is taken by Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar to the effect that the appeal being filed against the preliminary decree alone, while before the presentation of the appeal a final decree had also been passed, it is unsustainable. The question is covered by a number of decisions of this Court. It was first considered in Lakshmi v. Marudevi (1) and it was ruled that, under such circumstances an appeal against a preliminary order would be sustainable in spite of the fact that a final order had been passed in pursuance of the preliminary order. This ruling was followed in Ramien v. Veerappudian (2), Kuppusami Aiyar v. Regmah Boi Ammani (3) and Cunniah Mudaly v. Rangasami Mudaly (4). No doubt there is a decision Subramania Chettyar v. Palachakrapani Chettyar (5) which so far as it goes seems to take a somewhat different view. That is a decision of Sundara Aiyar, and Sadasiva Aiyar JJ. There the learned Judges do not discuss the previous decisions, though to the ruling in Lakshmi v. Marudevi (1) Sundara Aiyar, J., was himself a party. The same view of the law was taken in the Allahabad High Court in Kanhaiya Lal v. Tribeni Sahai (6), where a Full Bench decided, overruling some of the previous Division Bench rulings, that the fact that a final decree had been passed does not in any way affect the validity of an appeal against the preliminary decree. We think that the reasoning in Kuppusamy Aiyar v. Regmah Boi Ammani (3) and that in Kanhaiya Lal v. Tribeni Sahai (6) is based upon a correct view of the provisions of S. 97, Civil P. C., which requires that an appeal must be filed from the preliminary decree, that otherwise its correctness cannot be disputed afterwards in the appeal preferred from the final decree.

It can hardly be said that the final decree is that which follows the preliminary decree. It is not like the decree of an appellate Court superseding the decree of the lower Court which it reverses. A different view has prevailed in Khirodamoyi Dasi v. Adhar Chandra Ghose (7), Sadhu Charan Datta v. Hara Nath Datta (8) and Mackenzie v. Narsing Sahai (9) and also apparently in Dattatraya Ramachandra v. Ajmuddin Fakruddin (10). There may be cases such as in Khirodamoyi Dasi v. Adhar Chandra Ghose (7), where the final decree altogether dismisses the suit for non-prosecution; then different considerations may possibly arise. But so far as the present question is concerned, that is where the final decree is in accordance with the preliminary decree and does not in any way supersede it or modify it, supposing that is allowable, we think the weight of reasoning is in favour of the view which has almost unanimously prevailed in this Court. The preliminary objection will therefore be overruled.

We do not think that there is any substance in any of the arguments urged in this appeal against the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge. The most important question is whether there were separate payments of rent amounting to about Rs. 10,000 in addition to those entered in Sch. F to the plaint. The Subordinate Judge finds, we think quite rightly that there is really no evidence worth considering in support of the defence allegation that there were payments amounting to Rs. 10,000 over and above those for which the plaintiffs have given credit in their plaint. No receipt or vouchers were produced by the defendants nor any accounts, and the only documentary evidence with respect to payments is that furnished by the plaintiffs' accounts and the entries made on Ex. A on 22nd April 1914. The evidence on the side of the defence consists merely of very general statements of two of the defendants. They are not even able to specify the dates or the amounts of the different payments, if there were any such. There can be no doubt whatever that the finding of the Subordinate Judge on this point is correct, namely that there were no payments other than those with which the defendants have been credited.

That being found against the defendants, there is hardly any substance in the question raised regarding appropriation whether certain payments which were entered on Ex. A were made towards the rent due on the lands covered by Ex. B, that is the usufructuary mortgage. The evidence on this point on the plaintiffs' side seems to be more reliable than that on the side of the defendants. The case of the plaintiffs is that all these payments, including those in question, were entered on Ex. A, because the defendants had agreed to execute a mortgage for the bulk of the amount due on that date, that is Rs. 50,000, and the plaintiffs agreed to release some of the lands included in Ex. A from encumbrances. It was on the condition that such a document would be executed that all the payments were entered on Ex. A. This story seems to be corroborated by Ex. M, a letter written by plaintiff 1 to plaintiff 2, and accords more with the probabilities of the case than the version of the defendants. The payments though covering several years, were all made on one date. The defendants tried to make out that the entries in question were made for the purpose of appropriating the payments towards the discharge of Ex. A itself and none of the payments were with respect to Ex. B for rent, which according to them had been paid separately. They being unable to prove any separate payments, their version fails. Nor can the evidence in support of this story be said to be satisfactory. The Subordinate Judge, we think has also rightly found this issue in favour of the plaintiffs.

As regards interest, it has been rightly held by the trial Judge that the alleged agreement not being registered could not be used to prove that the rate of interest mentioned in the mortgagedeed was not the rate which the defendants are liable to pay. The learned vakil for the appellants tried to argue that there had been a remission of the higher rate of interest, but no such case was put forward in the lower Court and cannot therefore be entertained in the appeal for the first time. The last objection urged before us is with respect to Ex. C, the last of the mortgages for Rs. 8,000 intended for the benefit of plaintiff 4. But we think that the Subordinate Judge has correctly found that it was executed in his name for the benefit of plaintiffs 1 to 3 as well as himself. It was then argued that the rent for the Andu year 1086 was barred. This would be so but for the acknowledgment alleged to be contained in Ex. E. We have no doubt that Ex. E, though couched in general terms amounts in law to an acknowledgment. And it is also clear that defendant 22 in writing acted on behalf of the entire family, that is defendants 1 to 6. In the result the appeal is dismissed with costs of respondents 1 to 4.

Wallis, C. J.—The Subordinate Judge has proceeded upon the authority of the decision in Sreepada Venkataramana v. Sreepada Ramalakshmamma (1), but this case has been dissented from in Padmanabjudu v. Buchamma (2), which I prefer to follow. I am unable to agree with the observation in the former case that S. 42, Specific Relief Act, does not authorize such a suit as this. The effect of the widow's setting up a will giving her power to adopt is, in my opinion, to challenge the absolute right of the plaintiff to succeed on her death if he survives her, and to convert him, in the language of English law, from an heir-apparent into an heir-presumptive. The rule that Courts in India will not entertain a suit by the plaintiff for declaration that he is a nearer reversioner than the defendant is not, in my opinion, based on the view that such a suit does not come within the terms of S. 42, but on the settled practice of the Court in the exercise of its discretion under the section, and has been so treated by Lord Parker of Waddington in Saudagar Singh v. Pardip Narayan Singh (3). Where a will giving authority to adopt is being set up by a widow, it is expedient that the question should be settled at once, and not left open until the best evidence has disappeared, and a suit such as this may therefore be regarded as in the nature of a suit quia timet. I would allow the appeal, reverse the decree, and remand the suit for disposal according to law.

T. V. Venkatarama Aiyar and Y. Suryanarayana—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—The plaintiff who is the appellant, valued the lands referred to in the plaint at Rs. 100 and filed the suit in the District Munsif's Court. Objection was taken as to jurisdiction on the ground that the lands were greatly undervalued and that their proper value was beyond the Court's pecuniary jurisdiction. The District Munsif found on the evidence that the lands were worth Rs. 4,000 and ordered the plaint to be returned for presentation to the proper Court.

This order returning the plaint is appealable under O. 43, R. 1, Cl. (a), and an appeal was filed in the District Court. The District Judge, relying on S. 12, Cl. 1, Court-fees Act, held that no appeal lay as the decision of the District Munsif as to the valuation was final. I am of opinion that the decision of the District Judge cannot be supported. As was pointed out in Peari Shah v. Surja Mal (1) S. 12, Court-fees Act, has no application where the valuation is made by the Court for the purpose of determining the question whether the suit is within the pecuniary limits of the Court's jurisdiction. Order of Reference.

Sheshagiri Aiyar and Phillips, JJ.—The facts found are: Plaintiff and the defendant agreed that at the Court auction the property in suit should be purchased in the name of the defendant and that one-half of it should be conveyed to the plaintiff after obtaining the certificate of sale: some money was paid before the Court auction, and apparently plaintiff was put in possession of the half-share. In September 1907 a promissory note for the balance of the purchase money due from plaintiff was executed. Nearly 5 years afterwards, the promissory note was discharged and Ex. A was executed to the plaintiff in which it was provided that the defendant should execute a conveyance for the half-share whenever plaintiff demanded it. This suit is to enforce that agreement. In the plaint it is stated that the half-share intended to be conveyed was purchased in the name of the defendant benami for the plaintiff. The question for consideration is whether the suit is within the mischief of S. 66, Civil P. C. There is some difference between the language of S. 317 of the old Code; and that of S. 66 of the new Code: but we do not think there is any material alteration in the principle of the section. In this Court, the decisions have not been uniform on the question. In Kumara v. Srinivasa (1), Sankunni Nayar v. Narayanan Nambudri (2) and Kumbalinga Pillai v. Ariaputra Padiachi (3) suits under similar circumstances were held not barred by S. 317. On the other hand in Subramania Pillai v. Gopalarama Subramaniam (4) the decision was the other way. Recently, Coutts-Trotter and Srinivasa Iyengar, JJ., had to consider the question in Appeal Suits Nos. 167 and 215 of 1914. Chidambaram Chettiar v. Subramania Aiyar (5). Apparently, in the view taken by Coutts-Trotter, J., such a suit would not be affected by S. 66 of the Code. There is also the dictum of the Judicial Committee in Ganga Sahai v. Kesri (6) that the object of the section is to prevent judgment-debtors from getting property purchased in the names of third parties benami for themselves. The language of the section seems to be wider: However as the question is one of some importance, we have resolved to ask the opinion of a Full Bench on the following question:

"When the plaintiff alleges that the auction-purchaser is a benamidar for him and sues to enforce specifically a subsequent agreement executed by the certified purchaser to convey the property, is S. 66 a bar to such a suit ?"

Opinion.—We do not think that this is a suit against the auction-purchaser on the ground that the purchase was made on behalf of the plaintiff within the meaning of S. 66, Civil P. C. The finding is that the defendant agreed that the property should be purchased in the name of the defendant and that one-half of it should be conveyed by the defendant to the plaintiff after the sale certificate had been obtained. This in our opinion is not a benami transaction at all. The mere fact that the plaintiff alleges in the plaint that the auction-purchaser was a benamidar for him has not, in our opinion, the effect of debarring the plaintiff under S. 66, Civil P. C., from maintaining his suit for specific performance of an agreement by the auction-purchaser subsequent to the purchase to convey the property to the plaintiff. Such an agreement is not inconsistent with the auction-purchaser's own title, but rather the reverse. We answer the question in the negative.

Second Appeal No. 1498 of 1917, Decided on 12th August 1918, against decree of Dist. Judge, Tanjore, in Appeal Suit No. 680 of 1916.

(a) Hindu Law—Adoption—First adopted son dying while infant—Second adoption is valid.

(b) Hindu Law—Adoption—Power to adopt comes to end when estate vests in full owner capable of continuing line of succession.

The power to adopt comes to an end when the estate is vested in a person who is a full owner and fully capable of himself continuing the line of succession, and when once an estate is so vested, even though the last full owner has not taken steps to provide for its devolution after his death but has allowed it to devolve by process of law on a collateral, he has by his act or omission divested the succession and therefore the widow of his father cannot step in to divest the new heir in whom the property has vested: *A. K. Bashyam Iyengar, S. Panchapagesa Sastri and K. Sankara Sastri—for Respondents.

Oldfield, J.—One Ramasami Sastri died, leaving joint and separate property. Subsequently his widow under an authority given by him adopted two boys in succession, the second, now plaintiff-respondent, after the death of the first at the age of four. The question is, whether plaintiff is entitled against defendant 1, here appellant, the undivided brother of Ramasami Sastri, to a share in the joint property by partition and to the latter's separate property by inheritance. It is conceded that the widow would not be debarred merely by the failure of the first adoption from making a second; and it is not disputed that authority would be in plaintiff's favour, if there were only separate property. The question is whether he is entitled to a share in the joint property. Considerations of convenience and symmetry are on his side, since it would be anomalous that his adoption should be recognized to enable him to inherit one description of property and not to entitle him to partition of the other. It is not however necessary to resort to those considerations in order to find ground for a decision in his favour.

At p. 251, Mayne's Hindu Law, and Usage, Edn. 8, the rules deducible from the authorities regarding divestiture of estates in consequence of adoption are stated. But it is better to attempt to reach the principle, on which such rules may be founded, if only because the learned author's references to the divesting of estates are not always strictly applicable to joint family property, such as is now in dispute. That principle has been formulated differently on each side. Defendant 1 contends that the widow can adopt after the estate of a deceased adopted son or other person entitled has intervened between the death of her husband and the date of the adoption, only if she has herself succeeded in the absence of a successor to such son or person; plaintiff, that the principle is, as stated by Chandavarkar, J., in Ramkrishna v. Shamarao (1), that

"where a Hindu dies leaving a widow and a son and that son dies leaving a natural born or an adopted son or leaving no son, but his own widow to continue the line by means of adoption, the power of the former widow is etxinguished and can never afterwads be revived."

And this must, it will be seen, be extended to cases, in which the son did not actually leave a widow or give his widow authority, but died after reaching an age, at which he was capable of doing either. Shortly, the decisive consideration is on the one view the existence at the date of the disputed adoption of some one, other than the adopting widow, immediately entitled to the estate; on the other the previous extinction of the widow's power in consequence of other possibilities of the continuance of the line having arisen. In the present case on the one hand defendant 1 is such a person; but on the other, the first adopted son having died at the age of four, no such possibilities are in question and the widow's power is still exercisable.

The point does not fall to be decided on any text; and the doubt regarding it arises from the alleged ambiguity of the earliest authority on it, Chundrabullee's case (Mt. Bhoobun Moyee Debia v. Ram Kishore Acharj Chowdhry) (2). The question arose there between the son adopted by the widow of and the son's widow of one Gour Kishore, no co-parcener being in question. The material part of the judgment consists first in reference to the extinction of the widow's power, to the son's marriage, to his having lived to an age which enabled him to perform ceremonies for his father's benefit, or to adopt a son; and his failure to actually beget or adopt a son is explicitly treated as immaterial. All this supports plaintiff's argument. But there follows a reference, on which defendant 1 relies, to the facts that the son's widow had acquired a right to the estate and that in her absence Gour Kishore's widow would by the adoption have divested no estate but her own. And defendant's contention is no doubt reconcilable with the description of the decision in Vellanki Venkata Krishna Rao v. Venkata Rama Lakshmi (3) as not governing a "case, in which the adoption was made in derogation of the adoptive mother's estate", but deciding that "the son having died leaving a widow, in whom the inheritance had vested, the mother could not defeat the estate so vested by making an adoption."

The arguments addressed to us traced the current of authority in the High Courts, which have dealt with these alternative principles, Madras, Calcutta, Bombay, and showed that its direction has varied, particularly in the lastmentioned. But it is unnecessary to go through the cases, because all doubt has now been set at rest by the recent judgment of the Privy Council in Madana Mohana Ananga Bheema Deo v. Purushothama Ananga Bheema Deo (4), in plaintiff's favour. There the succession to an impartible zamindari was in dispute between a second adopted son and a reversioner, the first adopted son having died leaving a widow, who was not a party. Reference was made to Chundrabullee's case (Mt. Bhoobun Moyee Debia v. Ram Kishore Acharj Chowdhry) (2). The dictum of Chandavarkar, J., was explicitly adopted; and it was held, as the sole ground of decision, that the widow's power came to an end, when the son she first adopted died after attaining full legal capacity to continue the line, either by the birth of a natural born son or by the adoption to him of a son by his own widow. And this, it was stated explicitly, in no degree depended on the fact that there was no evidence as to whether the widow had or had not authority to make such an adoption.

It is then, however, argued that this result, the adoption of the rule proposed by plaintiff, which was all that was necessary in the case under disposal, does not in the present case negative the necessity for the application of that, for which defendant 1 contends, as a further test of the validity of the adoption. The question, it is said, to follow the words of Batchelor, J., in Bhimabai Krishnappa Desai v. Tayappa Murarrao (5), is not only whether the widow has power to adopt, but further whether, "given that the adoption does divest another heir's vested estate, the adoption is valid." The latter question the Privy Council no doubt had not to consider. But its reference to two other cases besides Chundrabullee's (2) indicates its attitude. In Padmakumari Debi Chowdhrani v. Court of Wards (6), Chundrabullee's adoption again came under consideration, the argument being that it might be valid, when it was relied on subsequently and for other purposes; and their Lordships explained their previous decision in words. which they quoted later in Thayammal v. Venkatarama (7) with reference to the ceremonial competence of the last male holder of the estate and on the consequent determination of the widow's power. This is the more significant, because in the judgments of the High Court under appeal, Puddo Kumaree Debee v. Juggut Kishore Acharjee (8), that reference had been directly challenged as due to inadvertence and the challenge was met by no suggestion that the decision was reached also on another ground. It is not possible in these circumstances to follow Batchelor, J., in the case above referred to and to treat any rule based on the fact that no estate but the widow's own was divested as the "summary and culmination" of the judgment in Chundrabullee's case Mt. Bhoobun Moyee Debia v. Ram Kishore Acharj Chowdhary (2). Such a rule, if it is not authorized by that judgment, cannot be founded on the short description of it given in Vellanki Venkata Krishna Rao v. Venkata Rama Lakshmi (3); and we have been shown no alternative source from which it can be derived.

Some argument has been attempted with reference to the principle that an adoption by the widow cannot divest an estate, which has vested, as the estate had done in Madana Mohana Ananga Bheema Deo v. Purushothama Ananga Bheema Deo (9), in the person entitled by the ordinary rules of succession; and it is further argued that divestiture of joint family property stands in any case on a different footing from that of impartible property. As regards the latter the case cited is sufficient authority, since it contrasts the divesting on the occasion of a previous adoption by the same widow with that in question in it and explains the former on the ground that, so long as the widow's power was operative, the person divested had only a temporary right to enter, which operated merely to prevent the succession falling into abeyance. See also Surendra Nandan v. Sailaja Kant (10), a case decided with reference to joint family property and therefore relevant to defendant 1's second contention just referred to.

As regards that contention, it would serve no good purpose to follow the argument through the various authorities cited, since in this Court the reference obiter by White, C. J., in Sinnachami v. Ramasamy Chettiar (11) to the absence of authority to show that the principle of Chundrabullee's case Mt. Bhoobun Moyee Debia v. Ram Kishore Acharj Chowdhary, (2) did not apply in the case of a joint. Hindu family and the full judgment of Seshagiri Aiyar, J., in Madana Mohana Ananga Bheema Deo v. Purushothama Ananga Bheema Deo (9) from which White, C. J., did not dissent and in which I respectfully concur, seem to me to place the point beyond doubt. True, the learned Judge was dealing in the latter case with the rather different question whether impartible property could be divested by an adoption not made to the last male holder. But it was a part of his argument that the question would have been answered similarly in the affirmative, if joint family property had been in dispute, because impartible property is merely joint family property subject to an exception as to enjoyment. The learned Judge's conclusion was apparently not assailed before the Privy Council and may be accepted as the law; and I cannot find and we have not been shown anything in the rule in the form, with which we are concerned, which makes the exception, to which he referred, material. It follows from the considerations referred to by him that the existence of a co-parcener otherwise competent to take by survivorship is no obstacle to the widow's exercise of the power of adoption recognized in Chun- drabullee's case Mt. Bhooban Moyee Debia v. Ram Kishore Acharj Chowdhary, (2) and in Madana Mohana Ananga Bheema Deo v. Purushotama Ananga Bheema Deo (4).

The result is that the second appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Phillips, J.—In this case the appellant, defendant 1 is the undivided brother of one Ramaswami Sastri and he appeals against the decree obtained by the plaintiff, the adopted son of Ramaswami Sastri, for his share in the family property. After Ramaswami Sastri's death his widow adopted a boy who died at the age of 4 and she afterwards adopted the plaintiff. The factum of adoption is not disputed, nor is it disputed that she had authority to make a second adoption provided it was not otherwise invalid in law. The sole question that has been argued before us is as to the validity of the plaintiff's adoption. The pleader for the appellant, relying on the case of Mt. Bhoobun Moyee Debia v. Ram Kishore Acharj Chowdhary (2), contends that a second adoption, which is not to the last male holder, cannot be allowed to divest the undivided brother of the estate which vested in him on the death of thelast male holder. It is not disputed that the the adoption of the first son was valid, although it equally divested the brother of the estate. The argument is that when the adoption is not to the last male holder its validity has to be determined on different principles to those which we should follow in considering an adoption to the last male holder. In Sri Virada Pratapa Raghunada Deo v. Sri Brozo Kishoro Patta Deo (12) the Privy Council upheld the validity of an adoption so as to oust a brother of the adoptive father in an impartible zamindari, and in Bachoo v. Mankorebai (13) the widow of one deceased brother was allowed to adopt a son after the death of another brother who left a posthumous son. It cannot therefore be disputed that a widow has power in an undivided family to adopt a son to the prejudice of the surviving members of the family, and it is difficult to see on what principle one can differentiate such an adoption when it is made to the last male holder of an undivided share from an adoption made to the last male holder but one, even if it can really be said that the share of a son in an undivided family is identical with the share of his deceased father. If in an undivided family the share of a deceased member vests in the survivor, the latter would be divested equally in both cases and to say that such a divestment is to be allowed in one case and not in the other, does not seem to be based on any particular principle. The leading case on the validity of such adoptions is Mt. Bhoobun Mayee Debia v. Ram Kishore Acharj Chowdhry (2) and it was there held generally that when a son had succeeded to the ancestral properly as heir and had full power of disposition over it and might have alienated it or might have adopted a son to succeed to it if he had no male issue of his body, then it is not open to his father's widow to make an adoption merely because the son died without male issue and without making an adoption, because her authority to adopt had come to an end. In that case the son had left a widow and it was held that she could not be divested by an adoption to her father-in-law when a natural born brother of her husband would not have divested her of her estate.

The argument for the appellant in this case has been based almost entirely on the question of devolution of property, and it has been contended that the validity of an adoption depends entirely on its effect on the devolution of the property belonging to the father to whom the adoption was made. This overlooks the other aspect of adoption, namely, that a son is adopted in order to perform certain ceremonies for his father and in order to continue his father's line for his father's benefit, and the principle underlying the decision in Mt. Bhoobun Moyee Debia v. Ram Kishore Acharj Chowdhry (2) has been stated in Ramkrishna v. Shamrao (1) by Chandavarkar, J., on p. 532 to be as follows:

> "Where a Hindu dies leaving a widow and a son, and that son dies leaving a natural born or adopted son or leaving no son but his own widow to continue the line by means of adoption, the power of the former widow is extinguished and can never afterwards be revived."

This principle was approved by a recent Privy Council decision in Madana Mohana Ananga Bheema Deo v. Purushothama Ananga Bheema Deo (4) and there their Lordships say that the authority to adopt conferred on the father's widow came to an end when the son she originally adopted died after attaining full legal capacity to continue the line either by the birth of a natural born son or by the adoption to him of a son by his own widow, and their Lordships observe further that they do not base their decision on the power of the son's widow to adopt, for they say that even in its absence the succession of Brojo Kishore (i. e., the son) and his dying after attaining full legal capacity to continue the line would in themselves have been sufficient to bring the limiting principle into operation.

It would seem therefore that the principle in these cases is that the power to adopt comes to an end when the estate is vested in a person, who is a full owner and fully capable of himself continuing the line of succession and that when once an estate is so vested even though the last full owner has not taken steps to provide for its devolution after his death, but has allowed it to devolve by process of law on a collateral, he has by his act or omission divested the succession and therefore ths widow of his father cannot step in to divest the new heir in whom the property has vested. There is a case in Bhimabai Krishnappa Desai v. Tayappa Murarrao (5), where a widow adopted a son who died unmarried. She then adopted another boy, which was held to be invalid because under the Bombay Hereditary Offices Act a reversioner had succeeded to the property on the death of the first adopted son, but that decision appears to rest upon the peculiar nature of the property in the case as otherwise it would be opposed to the case in Vellenki Venkata Krishna Rao v. Venkata Rama Lakshmi (3), where the Privy Council held that a widow could adopt a son on the death of her natural born son under age and unmarried. Nearly all of these cases deal with separate property and the question whether a second adoption can be made in an undivided family has not been definitely decided in any reported case. But the point has been considered in Madana Mohan Ananga Bheema Deo v. Purushothama Ananga Bheema Deo (9), where Seshagiri Aiyar, J., is of opinion that the theory that an adoption should be to the last male holder is not applicable to joint Hindu families living in co-parcenary. The late Sir Arnold White, C. J., was inclined to take a different view but was not prepared to assert it definitely and left the question open. In considering the case of an undivided Hindu family one point for consideration is whether the surviving member can be said to be divested of the share of the deceased member by the adoption of a son to him.

The exact interest in the family property of any particular member of an undivided family cannot be ascertained with any accuracy until the time of partition actually arrives. Any member's share is apt to be increased or decreased according as the number of members in the family is in creased or decreased and this point was considered in Bachoo v. Mankorebai (13), where it was held by Russell, J., that the survivor was not the sole absolute proprietor or full owner of the estate of his deceased brother ; and we see that in no decision has the principle, that when the adoption is not to the last full owner of the estate the question of divesting the heir comes into play, been applied to undivided property. If a person who takes an estate by survivorship is not the full owner—and it is difficult to look upon him as such, considering the fact that other members of the family may be born who will take an interest in the estate—the principle of adoption to any one not the last full owner would not apply to undivided families as pointed out by Seshagiri Aiyar, J., in Madana Mohana Ananga Bheema Deo v. Purushothama Ananga Bheema Deo (9). The present case is further complicated by the fact that plaintiff's adoptive father had self-acquired properties as well as ancestral property. So far as the former are concerned the adoption would be valid in accordance with the decision in Vellanki Venkata Krishna Rao v. Venkata Rama Lakshmi (3) and the point is conceded in argument ; but if the contentions for appellant are accepted the adoption would not be valid in respect of the ancestral property. In this view plaintiff would take the separate property as his father's son, but in respect of the ancestral property would not be his father's son. This reductio ad absurdum is, I think, an additional reason for holding that the principle contended for by appellant is not sound.

In this view I think the plaintiff's adoption in the present case must be held to be valid, for the first adopted son died as an infant at the age of 4 and unmarried, and in the words of the Privy Council had not attained "full legal capacity to continue the line." Therefore the adoption of a second son had merely the effect of continuing the line of the last full owner and did not disturb any new line of the inheritance. The circumstance requisite to determine the widow's power of adoption as laid down in Madana Mohana Ananga Bheema Deo v. Purushothama Ananga Bheema Deo (4) had not come into existence, and the adoption is therefore valid. The second appeal is dismissed with costs.

In a suit on a pro-note which was barred on the face of it, the plaintiff alleged two different payments by defendant as saving the bar. The only debts due by the defendant on the dates of the payments were the suit note and another hypothecation bond. The note was the earlier of the two. The plaintiff had appropriated the payments generally towards defendant's debts:

Judgment.—The Subordinate Judge disbelieves the plea of discharge. He finds the two payments alleged by the plaintiff to be true, but dismissed the suit on the ground that it was barred by limitation as the plaintiff did not make a special appropriation towards the defendant's accounts. The only transactions outstanding when the payments were made were the promissory note and the hypothecation. The note was the earlier of the two. If the appropriation was generally towards the sum due on both transactions, both will be saved. Madura Hindu Sabha Nidhi Co. Ltd. and others—Plaintiffs and Defendants—Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 1252 of 1917, Decided on 27th August 1918, against the decree of Dist. Judge, Madura, in Appeal Suit No. 273 of 1915.

Civil P. C. (1908), Ss. 11 and 47—Form 7 App. D—Mortgage decree in favour of mortgagee—Prior and puisne mortgages—Direction to puisne mortgagee to share in surplus sale proceeds—Private sale and satisfaction of decree—Suit by puisne mortgagee to enforce his mortgage is not barred.

The rights of a puisne mortgagee under a decree drawn up according to Form 7, Appendix D, Civil P. C., is contingent on the property being brought to sale for nonpayment of the sum found due to mortgagee 1, plaintiff, and the decree cannot be read as a decree directing the mortgagor to redeem each of the puisne encumbrancers within the time limited for redeeming mortgagee 1 and to entitle the puisne encumbrancer, on default, to bring the property to sale for nonpayment, not of the sum decreed to mortgagee 1, but to each of them. The utmost that the puisne mortgagee can claim is that, if mortgagee 1 for some reason or other does not apply for sale in spite of the fact that he has not been paid, the puisne mortgagee can apply for sale in order to work out his right to share in the surplus, if any. The puisne mortgagee cannot be treated as a decree-holder entitled to bring the property to sale in default of payment of the sum declared to be due to him. [P 102 C 2]

Plaintiff brought the present suit to enforce a mortgage in his favour by defendants 1 and 2. The latter had executed an earlier mortgage in favour of N. N. sued defendants 1 and 2 and also the present plaintiff as the puisne mortgagee and obtained a decree in Form 7, Appendix D, Civil P. C. Under that decree the property was to be sold and the present plaintiff was to share the surplus sale proceeds if any. One of the items was brought to sale in execution of the said decree but on the plaintiff satisfying N.'s decree by private sale, the Court sale was set aside. The plaintiff's mortgage not having been satisfied, the present suit was filed impleading defendant 12 who was the alienee from defendants 1 and 2. It was objected (1) that the plaintiff's right was only to execute the decree in the former suit and that the present suit was barred under S. 47, and (2) that the suit was barred as res judicata:

K. S. Jayarama Aiyar and T. L. Venkatrama Aiyar—for Appellant.

C. V. Ananiha Krishna Aiyar and P. S. Narayanaswami Aiyar—for Respondents.

Kumaraswami Sastri, J.—Defendant 12 is the appellant. Defendants 1 and 2 mortgaged certain items of property to one Naga Aiyar, who filed Original Suit No. 61 of 1910 on the file of the Court of the Principal District Munsif of Madura to recover the sum due on his mortgage. He impleaded the puisne mortgagees, one of whom was the present plaintiff Nidhi. A decree was passed in Form 7, Appendix D, Civil P. C. The amounts due to the plaintiff in the suit and the puisne mortgagee defendant were declared, but the sale of the mortgaged properties was ordered only in case the defendant did not pay the amount found due to the plaintiff, and the only right given to the puisne mortgagees was to share in the surplus, if any, arising out of the sale. One of the items of the property was brought to sale in execution of the decree, but the plaintiff decree-holder was satisfied as the amount due was paid under O. 21, R. 89, Civil P. C., and the sale set aside. The property was sold by private sale to the appellant As he did not pay the amount found in Original Suit No. 61 of 1910 to be due to respondent 1, herein, he sued for the recovery of the amount due to him as his mortgagor. Various defences were raised, the chief of which were (1) that the remedy of the plaintiff was by executing the decree in Original Suit No. 61 of 1910 and not by separate suit, and (2) that the second suit was barred, the matter being res judicata. The Subordinate Judge overruled the objections raised and passed a decree which was confirmed by the District Judge.

I am of opinion that the decision of the lower Courts is right. No doubt the present plaintiff Nidhi was party to Original Suit No. 61 of 1910 as a puisne encumbrancer and the amount due to it was ascertained. The decree however did not direct redemption of the subsequent mortgagees and expressly authorized sale only in case the amount due to mortgagee 1 was not paid within the time limited. The only right given to the puisne encumbrancers was the right to redeem mortgage 1 and on sale to share in the surplus sale proceeds in order of priority. In Sarat Chandra Roy v. Nahapiet (1) the effect of a decree drawn up under Form 7, Appendix D, of the Code was considered, and Pugh, J., was of opinion that there was no right conferred on mortgagee 2 to get any relief at all if the mortgagor satisfied mortgagee 1's claim. He observed:

"In my view therefore under the Code, mortgagee 2 is there simply for the purpose as indicated by Brett and Mookerjee, JJ., in Mackintosh v. Watkins (2) of receiving any surplus sale proceeds or of redeeming, and that he cannot take any independent action and treat the decree as in other respects in his favour."

Referring to Kissory Mohun Roy v. Kally Churn Ghose (3) the learned Judge distinguished the case on the ground that it related to a decree passed as on the original side of the High Court; and in Mackintosh v. Watkins (2) Brett, J., took the view that the practice and procedure followed in the original side was not to govern decrees passed by Courts in the mofussil, which were governed by the Civil P. C., and T. P. Act. In Mackintosh v. Watkins (2) it was held by Brett and Mookerjee, JJ., that in a suit by a mortgagee 1 impleading the mortgagor and the puisne mortgagees, the mortgagor cannot be called upon to redeem the subsequent mortgagee defendants and that they are not entitled to have the property sold for the nonpayment of the sums due to them. Brett, J., observed that the object of impleading the puisne mortgagee was to enable the property to be sold free from his encumbrance, and " not to enable him to practically obtain a decree against the principal defendant without bringing a suit properly framed for the purpose."

The learned Judge was also of opinion that such a procedure would be opposed to the provisions of Ch. 3, Court-fees Act. Mookerjee, J., was of opiuion that Ss. 86 to 89, T. P. Act

"do not provide that the mortgagor may be called upon by the decree nisi to pay to a puisne encumbrancer, who has been joined as a party defendant, what may be found due to him upon his mortgage; the mortgagor therefore cannot incur the liability to have his property sold by reason of nonpayment of the dues of the subsequent encumbrancer."

He held that if the mortgagor defendant pays to the plaintiff mortgagee what may have been found due to him, the property was not liable to be sold under the decree in the suit at the instance of the second mortgage. In Sarurjigar Begam v. Baroda Kant Mitter (4) the same learned Judge was of opinion that if the amount due to the first mortgagee was paid, there can be so sale of the mortgaged properties and the puisne encumbrancers would obtain no relief in the suit.

It is contended for the appellant that in a mortgage suit when puisne encumbrancers are made parties defendants there is a decree in favour of each of the mortgagees which can be executed by him, and reliance has been placed on Govinda Taragan v. Veeran (5) and the unreportod decision in Appeal Against Appellate Order No. 87 of 1907. I do not think these decisions support the broad propositions contended for. The former case related to a suit for redemption of a mortgage, and it was held that para. 2, S. 93, T. P. Act did not take away the right from the plaintiff mortgagor to apply for a sale. The learned Judges after discussing the right of the mortgagor and mortgagee, observe that in some cases provisions for sale may be as much for the benefit of the mortgagor as for the benefit of the mortgagee and that:

"Where the decree is imperative there is no reason why the decree should not be regarded as passed for the benefit of all the parties to the suit."

They thought there was no reason for holding that any of the parties to the suit, who would be benefited by the sale, cannot apply for the enforcement of the decree. I should be observed that the suit was between mortgagor and mortgagee and no question arose as to the rights of puisne encumbrancers. The decree was for redemption, and the only question was whether it was open to the plaintiff in a redemption suit to apply for sale under Ss. 92 and 93, T. P. Act. In the present case there is nothing in the decree directing the mortgagor to pay off the subsequent mortgagees. The decree no doubt declared the amount due to them, but this was only with the view of enabling them to share in the surplus should the property be sold owing to nonpayment of the sum due to the plaintiff who was the first mortgagee. The right of the subsequent mortgagees under the decree drawn up according to Form 1, Appendix D, Civil P. C., is contingent on the property being brought to sale for nonpayment of the sum found due to the plaintiff mortgagee, and the decree cannot be read as a decree directing the mortgagor to redeem each of the puisne encumbrancers within the time limited for redeeming the first mortgagee and to entitle the puisne encumbrancer on default to bring the property to sale for nonpayment not of the sum decreed due to the first mortgagee, but each of them.

The utmost that can be said is that if the first mortgagee for some reason or other does not apply for sale in spite of the fact that he has not been paid, the other mortgagees can apply for sale in order to work out the rights to share in the surplus, if any. This is quite different from their applying to sell the property to discharge the amount declared due to each of them. If the mortgagor pays off the amount for which alone a sale in default of payment was directed, it is difficult to see how under the express terms of the decree, each puisne encumbrancer can come forward and ask for sale. No time is fixed in the decree for redeeming them. There is no direction in the decree directing the mortgagee to pay them any amount and the right to share, which is dependent on there being a sale, and a surplus after paying off the plaintiff mortgagee, cannot be enforced if for any reason the sale cannot take place at the instance of the plaintiff. Reference has been made to the English practice as set out in Platt v. Mendel (6) and Daniel's Chancery Practice, but it is unnecessary to consider whether having regard to the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act, Courts in India can pass a decree directing plaintiff to redeem each of the puisne mortgagees, and direct a sale at the instance of each of them in case of his failure to do so. No such decree has been passed in the present case. In Appeal Against Appellate Order No. 87 of 1917 the submortgagee applied to enforce the decree in favour of his mortgagor who was the mortgagee from the owner of the property. All that was held was that he was entitled to apply for execution and to work out his rights by the sale of the property. The sale was to be for the amount directed in the decree to be paid by the original mortgagor to the mortgagee who in turn submortgaged the property to the defendant. There is nothing in the judgment which suggests that puisne mortgagees should be treated as decree-holders entitled to bring property to sale, in default of payment of the sum declared to be due to them though the decree contains no direction that they should be redeemed or that property should be sold in default of payment of the sums declared to be due to the puisne mortgagees. The submortgagee is an assignee of the original mortgagee and his being allowed to work out his rights, doing what his mortgagor could have done, would not confer similar rights on third parties claiming in their own right.

As respondent 1 was not entitled to execute the decree in Original Suit No. 61 of 1910, S. 47, Civil P. C., has no application. As regards the question of res judicata the present suit is beyond the pecuniary limits of the jurisdiction of the District Munsif. Original Suit No. 61 of 1910, which was on the file of the District Munsif's Court, cannot render the present suit as res judicata. Moreover, as pointed out in Debendra Nath Sen v. Mirza Abdul Samed (7), a suit by a puisne mortgagee, who is a party to a prior suit by another mortgagee can only be barred if the puisne mortgagee is in a position to have his claim satisfied from the surplus sale proceeds realized in execution of the decree in the prior suit. The second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (1887), S. 17—Provision is not mandatory— Deposit need not accompany application if made before hearing there is sufficient compliance.

When an application is made under S. 17 to set aside an ex parte decree, the deposit required by the section need not be made at the time of presenting the application. The provisions of the section not being mandatory, it would be sufficient compliance therewith if the amount is deposited before the application is heard.

S. Swaminadhan—for Petitioner.

T. Ramachandra Rao — for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—In this case an ex parte decree was passed on 27th July 1917. The defendant, alleging that he did not become aware of the decree till 26th August 1917, and that the summons was not served on him personally, applied to set aside the ex parte decree. This was on 29th August 1917. It is conceded that along with the petition the amount of the decree was not deposited. It is said that it was deposited before the application was heard. We express no opinion as to whether this deposit after the time allowed for the application is valid or not. The only question before us is whether the provision in S. 17, Act 9 of 1887 is directory or mandatory. Parker and Wilkinson, JJ., held in Ramasami v. Kurisu (1) that it was not mandatory. Miller J. in Suryanarayana v. Ramanna (2) did not dissent from this view. So this decision of Parker and Wilkinson, JJ., has stood unchallenged in this Court for nearly thirty years, and we feel no doubt that the practice regarding the receipt of the deposit amount in the mofussil Courts has been in consonance with that ruling.

We would therefore have followed the ruling without assigning reasons, had it not been for the fact that Ayling, J., in the admission Court and Krishnan, J., in the final Court sitting as a single Judge, have questioned the correctness of Ramasami v. Kurisu (1). If we may say so, the language of S. 17, Mofussil Small Cause Courts Act, does not seem to lend itself to the interpretation placed on it in Ramasami v. Kurisu (1). In Jogir Ahir v. Bishen Dayal Singh (3), Jagannath v. Chet Ram (4) and Somabhai v. Wadilal (5) the ruling of this Court has not been accepted as good law. But the interpretation is not without precedent. In regard to cases under the Pensions Act, which by Ss. 4 to 6 require a certificate of the Collector before the plaint is filed it has been held that the production of the certificate before judgment would cure the defect. The same view was taken of the requirements of Ss. 92 and 93, Civil P. C., relating to the sanction of the Advocate-General or the Collector. Reference may also be made to suits for which the production of a succession certificate is necessary. These classes of of cases supply an analogy for the liberal interpretation placed on the section in Ramasami v. Kurisu (1).

(1) [1890] 13 Mad. 178.
(2) [1910] 34 Mad. 88=6 I. C. 400.

Further the policy of the legislature in demanding payment is to enable the successful decree-holder to take cut immediate execution. The relief in a small cause suit being expected to be a speedy and a summary one, the legislature demands that the successful plaintiff should not be put off for a further period by not making the decree amount available to him for immediate execution. Therefore although if the case had come before us for the first time, we would have taken the view which the plain language of S. 17 suggests, having regard to the fact that the decision now questioned has been law in this Presidency for nearly 30 years, that there is nothing opposed to justice in the interpretation placed on the section by two learned Judges of this Court and that there are analogies which may justify the view taken in Ramasami v. Kurisu (1), we think it unnecessary to refer the matter for the consideration of a Full Bench.

We must reverse the order of the lower Court and remit the application for disposal in the light of the above observations. Costs will abide.

 Stamp Act (2 of 1899), S. 19—Unstamped pro-note validly executed outside British India—It is admissibile in British Indian Court without affixing stamp—Suit is maintainable.

If a promissory note executed outside British India is valid according to the law of the place where it was executed, it can ordinarily be sued upon in India and is admissible in a British Indian Court without affixing any Indian stamp on it. If any stamp is necessary, it is sufficient if, at the time of the decree, an Indian stamp is affixed to it: 8 M. L. J. 182 and 22 Mad. 337, Foll. [P 104 C 2]

Judgment.—The suit is based upon the promissory notes executed at Mecca in favour of the plaintiff. The Subordinate Judge has held that they are inadmissible in evidence. He has not referred to any authorities in support of his possession. Apparently what he had in mind was S. 19, Stamp Act. It was pointed out in Simulu Ebrahim Rowthan v Abdul Rahiman Mahomed (1) and Mohamad Rowthan v. Mohamed Husin Rowthan (2) that it is not necessary before suit to affix a British stamp on documents executed outside British India unless it be for the purposes of acceptance, payment, endorsement, transfer or negotiation. It is argued for the respondents that filing a suit comes under one of these categories. I am unable to agree with this suggestion. If a document is valid according to the law of the place where it was executed, it can ordinarily be sued upon in India without affixing any Indian stamp on the document. Probably the suggestion of Shephard, J., in Simulu Ebrahim Rowthan v. Abdul Rahiman Mahomed (1) may be accepted, namely that if any stamp is necessary it would be sufficient if at the time of the decree an Indian stamp was affixed to the document. am not sure whether, under the law prevailing in Mecca, a promissory note like this without any stamp on it could have been sued upon. But the position taken up by the Subordinate Judge is certainly untenable. It is opposed to the decisions I have referred to. I must, therefore reverse his decision and remand the suit for disposal in the light of the above observations. Costs hitherto incurred will follow the event.

Ramaswami Naidu and others—Plaintiff and Defendants—Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 1000 of 1917, Decided on 10th January 1919. from decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Tanjore.

(a) Transfer of Property Act (4 of 1882), S. 54—Transferee from stranger is not entitled in suit by true owner, to refund of portion of consideration used to pay debts of true owner—Principles of equity has no application nor Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877), S. 41.

Where property is sold by a person having no title to it, and the true owner or any one deriving title from him afterwards sues to recover possession the purchaser is not entitled to be reimbursed for the simple debts of the true owner which he has paid out of the sale consideration before surrendering the property.

The right cannot be supported either on the general principles of equity or under the statutory provision contained in S. 41, Specific Relief Act, and the Court will not make an order for compensation where the property has been sold by a stranger as his own property, even though the true owner has benefited thereby: 28 *I. (b) Transfer of Property Act (4 of 1882), Ss. 54 and 68—Purchaser from trespasser redeeming mortgage by true owner is entitled to be subrogated and can claim amount before surrendering property to owner.

Where however the purchaser has released the property from a mortgage debt binding on it, he is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee and to claim to be reimbursed for the amount paid by him, before he can be directed to deliver the property to the true owner.

(c) Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877), Ss. 39 and 41—In suit for possession by owner against purchaser from trespasser deed need not be set aside.

In the suit by the real owner, the plaintiff need not pray for the cancellation of the documents. [P 107 C 2]

(d) Transfer of Property Act (4 of 1882), S. 68—Purchaser in good faith paying amount to vendor without title to redeem mortgage binding on estate becomes equitable assginee of mortgage.

Where a person buys property in good faith and for the purpose of clearing a mortgage on that property pays money to the vendor to be so applied then even if the vendor had no title, still as the mortgage was binding on the estate the vendee becomes an equitable assignee of the mortgagee. C. A. Sheshagiri Sastri— for Appellant.

T. V. Muthu Krishnier—for Respondents.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J. — Defendant 1 is the appellant before us. The plaintiff brought a suit for possession of certain properties which had been bequeathed to him by his elder brother Abboy Naidu (when the plaintiff was a minor) under a will dated 4th August 1901. The plaintiff's mother, asserting a title in herself to the property, sold it to defendant 1 in February 1904 under Ex. 6 for a sum of Rs. 3,400. The title she asserted against her deceased son Abboy Naidu (in whose name the title-deeds stood) and against Abboy Naidu's brother and legatee, the minor plaintiff, was based upon her contention that though the property was purchased in Abboy Naidu's name, Abboy Naidu was a benamidar for herself (his mother). The plaintiff, of course, denied that Abboy Naidu was a benamidar for his mother and he sued upon his title derived from Abboy Naidu. He also prayed in his plaint for the cancellation, if necessary, of the deed of February 1904 executed by his mother. I might at once say that not only is no such cancellation necessary but that the plaintiff has no legal cause of action to get the relief of the cancellation of a document which was not executed and which does not even purport to have been executed by himself or by anybody from whom he traces his title. The lower appellate Court has found on the facts in the plaintiff's favour and, on his title so found, given a decree for him. The contentions argued before us in second appeal were that the plaintiff in any event should have been ordered to pay the amounts of the debts binding on Abboy Naidu and, therefore on his legatae (the plaintiff) and paid by defendant 1 as purchaser under Ex. 6 before the plaintiff recovers the properties; secondly, that so far at least as a mortgage debt binding on the plaintiff was paid by her, she was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of mortgagee and that the plaintiff ought to be made to pay the amounts due to her as such mortgagee by right of subrogation before recovering the properties.

So far as the debts other than the mortgage debt are concerned the learned vakil for the appellant, Mr. Seshagiri Sastri, put forward his contention under three heads: The first head may be formulated thus: though the plaintiff's mother purported to execute the deed in her own right alleging herself to be the sole owner, defendant, 1 as a bona fide purchaser for value, is entitled to treat the sale deed as having been executed by the plaintiff's mother as his guardian and in that view the plaintiff is bound to reimburse so much of the purchase money as went to discharge the debts binding upon the plaintiff. Having heard full arguments, I do not think that any case quoted on the appellant's behalf supports her contention. On the other hand, the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Balwant Singh v. R. Clancy (1) directly held that where a person who was the de jure manager of an undivided family purported to create a mortgage as if he was the full owner denying the right of the junior member of the family, the alienee cannot under either the ordinary principles of equity or under the statutory provision (S. 41, Specific Relief Act) claim to be reimbursed the portion of the consideration which went to discharge the debts binding on the junior member of the family. As regards the decisions of this Court in Sabapathy Chetty v. Ponnusawmy Chetty (2) and Audimula Mudali v. Alamalammal (3), the alienations were by a Hindu father who for certain purposes has got all the powers of a full owner and in whom the interest of a full legal owner is vested for many purposes notwithstanding that he might have undivided sons. The decisions in those cases seem to have gone on the particular facts of those cases and the Court came to the conclusion on the evidence that there was nothing to prevent the Court from holding that the father (alienor) intended also to make the disputed alienation in a capacity which would have given him an interest sufficient to affect the rights of his son also, and that in the case of a bona fide purchaser for value such an inference should if possible, be drawn from the facts and circumstances of those particular cases. In this case it seems to me it is impossible on the evidence and on the pleadings to hold that the plaintiff's mother could have intended to act in any other capacity than that of herself being the full owner.

Further in those cases, the documents of alienation were not mere waste papers conveying no title or interest whatever in the property alienated as in this case, but did affect, at least, the part-ownership right of the alienor. In the case of Bijraj Nopani v. Sreemutty Pura Sundary Dasee (4) the document was executed (along with others) by a person who was the full legal owner, who had the right to convey the full legal ownership and who intended to convey such full rights. It was under those circumstances held that the erroneous description of the origin and incidents of his title in the sale deed did not prevent the alienee from obtaining a valid title to the rights of a full owner. I do not think that that case has any bearing upon the question we are now considering. As regards the English cases of salvage quoted by the appellant's learned vakil, they were cases where a person who was not the owner of goods paid freight and other similar charges and the jury were held justified in estimating damages to allow such charges to be deducted in favour of the wrongdoer, where the plaintiff's action was brought for damages in trover or where the defendant had an option to return the goods or to pay damages Those cases also have no bearing on the question now under consideration. On the other hand there is a case in Nathu v. Balwantrao (5) which is a direct authority on this point; and respectfully concurring in that decision. I would hold that defendant 1 has no right to recover any sums which she paid to discharge Abboy Naidu's debts and which were not charged upon any immovable property. As stated by the Privy Coun-eil in Ram Tuhul Sing v. Biseswar Lall Sahoo (6), quoted in the above case :

"It is not in every case in which a man has benefited by the money of another that an obligation to repay that money arises. The question is not to be determined by nice considerations of what may be fair or proper according to the highest morality. To support such a suit, there must be an obligation, express or implied, to repay."

Then we have left for consideration the other point based upon the allegation that defendant 1 has released the property from the mortgage charge created by Abboy Naidu by payment of certain sums of money to the mortgage. I think that if defendant 1 in good faith purchased the property from the plaintiff's mother and as such purchaser felt herself bound to pay a mortgage charge created by the real owner, which charge the plaintiff was himself under an obligation to meet, she is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee in so far as her money went to discharge that mortgage. I think I need refer only to the two decisions of this Court in Syamalarayudu v. Subbarayudu (7) and Cnama Swami v. Padala Anandu (8) in support of this proposition. The lower Courts however have not gone into that question, namely, whether defendant 1, after her purchase paid any money to the mortgagee mentioned in Ex. 6 in payment of the mortgage dated 19th April 1899. Before finally disposing of this appeal it is therefore necessary to obtain a finding from the lower appellate Court on the following issue on the evidence on record: Did defendant 1 pay any amount to the mortgagee under the mortgage deed of 1899 for the purpose of discharging the encumbrance on the plaint properties and if so, what are the amounts and dates of such payments? The finding will be submitted within four weeks from the date of the recipt of the records and ten days will be allowed for objections.

Napier, J.—I agree. The first point taken by the appellant is that we should not accept the finding of the lower appellate Court that the plaintiff's mother purported only to convey her own interest and totally ignored any interest in the plaintiff ; and reliance is placed on the decision in Audimula Mudali v. Alamalammal (2), where the Court stated as follows :

"In our opinion Courts should incline to the view that the transferor alienated the property in the capacity most beneficial to the bona fide purchaser."

This doctrine may be properly applicable for the purpose of ascertaining on the evidence what the intention of the transferor is, but where, as in a case like this, the transferor deliberately claimed that the person in whom the title stood was only a benamidar for her and that the property was her own absolute property, it is impossible to find any ambiguity and thereby give any scope for the application of this doctrine. We must deal with this case on the footing that a stranger having no interest in any property, but making a claim against the titles which were vested in another person sold that property to a third person. It is now further argued that as part of the proceeds of the purchase money went to discharge the debts which would have been binding on the vendor if the title had vested in her and were in fact debts which were binding on the true owner, the true owner cannot recover the property without making compensation for the discharge of those debts. It is sought to support this proposition on two grounds: one, that it is covered by the language of the Specific Relief Act, Ss. 39 and 41; the other that there is an equity which the Courts should apply. With regard to the claim under the Specific Relief Act, reference to the chapter shows that this claim only arises in suits for cancellation of instruments, S. 41 being :

"On adjudging the cancellation of an instrument, the Court may require the party to whom such relief is granted to make any compensation to the other which justice may require."

This is undoubtedly an application of the English doctrine of the Chancery Courts that he who seeks equity must do equity ; and the first point we have to be satisfied on is whether there was any necessity for the plaintiff in this case to seek equity. As my learned brother pointed out, all that the plaintiff said in this suit was that if it was necessary to have the document cancelled the Court should do it. To my mind it is clear that there is no necessity to have this document cancelled. The illustrations to S. 39 indicate that it is only where a party cannot get his legal remedy without first having the document set aside that he comes within the section. This is a suit by the true owner to recover possession of the property. The title adverse to him is not one procured from him or from any one under whom he claims or from any one who purported to convey an interest of his. It seems to me therefore that there can be no necessity for him to apply to have the document cancelled and further that the Court would have no jurisdiction to do so. But it is urged on us that in a case reported as Mallacheruvu Raghavayya v. Mallacheruvu Subbayya (9), where the suit was to recover possession of property, the Court held that they were empowered to give compensation under this section. The case is Second Appeal No. 803 of 1916.

In that case however the plaintiff who brought the suit to recover the property himself executed a sale deed of certain lands to defendant 2 jointly with his undivided brother defendant 1. At the time of the conveyance he was a minor. The Court then considered the question as to whether he represented he was of age and found that was not proved. So in that case there was in existence a document from the true owner which on the face of it conveyed the property. In those circumstances, although the suit was one for recovery of property, the learned Judges thought that the document must be set aside first and that therefore the doctrine applied. It is therefore no authority for the contentions in this case. I am therefore clearly of opinion that this doctrine does not apply.

It is next argued that the equitable doctrine entitles us to give relief, and reliance is placed on the case of Mohori Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (10), a decision of the Privy Council. In that case a minor had executed a mortgage in favour of one Brahmo Datt to secure the payment of Rs. 20,000. A suit was brought on the mortgage. On the day the mortgage was executed the minor signed a declaration that he was of age. Two months after the execution of this mortgage he by his mother as guardian brought a suit against the mortgagee praying for a declaration that the mortgage was void and inoperative and that it should be delivered up and cancelled. Their Lordships of the Privy Council dealt with the question as to whether compensation should be given under two heads, on which it was argued, viz., the Specific Relief Act and the equitable right. Their Lordships appear to have recognized the possibility of the application of S. 41, Specific Relief Act, to the case. But they say that the lower Courts saw no reason for ordering the return of the money and they themselves would not interfere. They then consider the application of the purely equitable doctrine and state the proposition:

"It was also contended that one who seeks equity must do equity."

Now it must be noted that in this case there was no question but that the plaintiff was seeking equity, namely for directing the mortgage to be delivered up and cancelled. And then referring to the decision of the Court of appeal in Thurston v. Nottingham Permanent Benefit Building Society (11) they quoted the language of Rome, L. J., which is as follows:

"The short answer is that a Court of equity cannot say that it is equitable to compel a person to pay any moneys in respect of a transaction which, as against that person, the legislature has declared to be void."

So that apart from the Statute they held that even where a minor has received a benefit under a void mortgage, he cannot be compelled by any principle of equity to give compensation. The fundamental doctrine was stated in the judgment of the Privy Council in a case which is quoted in Nathu v. Balwantrao (5), which is Ram Tuhul Sing v. Biseswar Lall Sahoo (6). The doctrine is as follows;

"It is not in every case in which a man has benefited by the money of another that an obligation to repay that money arises. The question is not be determined by nice considerations of what may be fair or proper according to the highest morality. To support such a suit, there must be an obligation, expressed or implied, to repay. It is well settled that there is no such obligation in the case of a voluntary payment by A of B's debt."

We have therefore to find some obligation on the part of the plaintiff in the case to repay the amounts which have been paid by defendant 1 in discharge of his debts. It is well settled that there is no such broad obligation under the Contract Act; and it rests on defendant 1 to find some doctrine which will enable her to ask the Court to make the order. The language here is a very specific and definite warning to Courts that they must not use their powers simply to avoid hardships. The question in which this very point arose was decided by the Privy Council in Balwant Singh v. R. Clancy (1). There undoubtedly a person sought to be charged had been largely benefited by money lent by a bank to his brother for the discharge of debts binding on the family. The brother had however borrowed the money claiming to be a Rajah owning an impartible zamindari. The Privy Council decided that the money was borrowed by him in that capacity and in no other, and that it is not open to the Courts to find that because he was the manager of a joint family, the borrowing could be attributed to that capacity; and the claim of the bank to make his younger brother liable in respect of debts which had been cleared from the joint family property, being the debts of his father, was negatived. It seems to me that we cannot make any order for compensation in this case without directly disregarding the decision in Balwant Singh v. R. Clancy (1). I am therefore of opinion that there is no doctrine which will empower a Court to make an order for compensation where the property has been sold by a stranger as the stranger's property even though the true owner has benefited. That is the broad proposition. There is however another doctrine which may affect some payments in this case, and that is one analogous to the doctrine of salvage. It is dealt with in the case of Syamalaragudu v. Subbarayudu (7) and Chama Swami v. Padala Anandu (8) and the doctrine comes tot his; that where a person buys property in good faith and for the purpose of clearing a mortgage on that property pays money to the vendor to be so applied then even if the vendor had no title still as the mortgage was binding on the estate, the vendee becomes an equitable assignee of the mortgage. This doctrine has been applied in those two cases and although some doubts have been thrown upon it in Shiam Lal v. Ram Piari (12), it seems to me that it is founded on right principles and I think that we should follow the decisions of our Court. I agree therefore with the order of my learned brother remanding an issue for trial.

(12) [1909] 32 All. 25=64 I. C. 70.

Finding.—The High Court in its order dated 13th September 1918, in Second Appeal No. 1000 of 1917, has directed submission of a finding on the following issue on the evidence already on record,

"Did defendant 1 pay any amount to the mortgagee under the mortgage-deed of 1899 for the purpose of discharging the encumbrance on the plaint properties, and if so, what are the amounts and dates of such payments?"

The mortgage bond referred to in the suit is marked Ex. F, and is dated 19th April 1899. Ex. 6, dated 1st February 1904, is the sale deed taken by Ammani Ammal for Rs. 3,400, of which Rs. 2,400 was said to have been paid in cash and Rs. 1.000 retained by her, a security bond having been given for that amount. The vendee, Ammani Ammal, was examined as P. W. 1 and she says that prior to the execution of Ex. 6 another sale deed had been executed which could not be registered because of the several mistakes it had, and Ex. 6 was subsequently executed and registered. Rs. 2,400 is said to have been paid on the day of the infructuous prior sale deed, but not under the subsequent sale deed, Ex. 6 She does not know whether the mortgage deed was discharged by the mortgagor Poongol Ammal, or not, and what amount, if at all was paid towards it. But the mortgagee, Ramaswami Nayudu, filed a suit registered as Original Suit No. 264 of 1904, on the file of the Mayavaram District Munsif's Court, for the amount due under the mortgage bond Ex. F, and the suit was compromised, adjustment of the claim having been certified. Ammani Ammal says that, with a view to bring about the compromise she paid Rs. 200 to Poongol Ammal and obtained a receipt, Ex. 1-B, on 6th October 1905, in token of the discharge of the mortgage claim. The receipt shows that the full amount due under the mortgage bond had been paid to the mortgagee Ramaswami Nayudu, who was examined as plaintiff's witness 4 in this suit. His version is that, subsequent to the institution of the suit, accounts were settled between him and Poongal Ammal, that he had to pay her Rs. 360 towards the amount of rent due under Ex. E, and towards the price of two head of cattle purchased by him from Poongol Ammal, and that Rs. 283 was paid to him by defendant 1 through the mortgagor, Poongol Ammal. It was on settlement of his claim as evidenced by Ex. 1-B, he withdrew the suit.

The other persons that refer to the sale deed are D. W. 2 Vaithinatha Ayyar, and D. W. 3, Kumaraswami Pillai. D. W. 2 wrote the first abortive sale deed and speaks to money having been paid in his presence though he does not remember how much was paid. D. W. 3 who attested Ex. 6 did not see any cash paid in his presence but he was told by the vendor that she had received consideration and he attested the document on that assurance. These are all the facts relevant to the issue that could be culled from the evidence on record with regard to the mortgage deed and its discharge.

The question therefore to be determind is whether any consideration was paid under the sale deed, Ex. 6. and if so how much of it went towards the distharge of the mortgage deed, Ex. F, and if no amount, paid towards Ex. 6 or towards tha prior abortive saledeed, went towards discharge of the mortgage deed, whether any amount was subsequently paid towards such discharge, and how much.

It is clear that no consideration was paid at the time of the execution of Ex. 6, the sale deed. The evidence of Ammani Ammal and Vaithinatha Ayyar, D. W. 2, tends to show that Rs. 2,400 was paid under the prior infructuous sale deed and a security bond was executed for the balance of Rs. 1,000. The vendee Ammani Ammal herself had to get some money under Ex. 4, a pro-note executed to her by Poongol Ammal, and the amount due thereunder was deducted from the Rs. 2,400 paid at the execution of the first sale deed, and only the balance was paid to the vendor. The evidence as to the execution of Ex. 4, the truth of the debt evidenced by it, and the necessity for Poongol Ammal to borrow that money on the occasion of settling the maintenance claim of Sitalakshimi Ammal is convincing, and I need not dwell upon it. The facts that there was a debt due to Ammani Ammal herself, that a sale deed was first executed to her and latterly it had to be renewed by Ex. 6, and that a security bond had to be executed for Rs. 1,000, all go to show that the sale must have been a genuine transaction supported by consideration. There is absolutely no reason why Poongol Ammal should have executed a nominal sale deed to Ammani Ammal without receiving any consideration for it. Consideration must therefore have passed under the document antecedent to Ex. 6 and we have to see whether any portion of that consideration went towards the discharge of the mortgage deed. There is no evidence on that point, Ammani Ammal herself not knowing anything about it. The fact that the mortgagee had to institute a suit in that very year, about eight months after, shows that the mortgage deed was not discharged and that Ammani Ammal did not take care to see that the money paid by her actually went in discharge of the mortgage debt. We are therefore not practically concerned with the amount paid at the time of the execution of the prior abortive sale deed.

The next point we have to consider is whether Ammani Ammal paid anything to bring about the withdrawal of Original Suit No. 264 of 1904 on the file of the Kumbakonam Court by payment of any cash. She says she paid Rs. 200 as a present to Poongol Ammal to bring about the compromise; and the mortgagee himself who actually took the money and executed Ex. 1-B in token of the discharge of the encumbrance says that Ammani Ammal paid Rs. 285 to Poongol Ammal, who paid that amount into his hands. Ex. 1-B does not mention the amount specifically, but says that the entire amount due was paid in cash. Whatever may be the truth of the statement that Rs. 360 was set off against the amount due from the mortgagee, there is no doubt that Rs. 285 was paid for the withdrawal of the suit; and as the other amount of Rs. 360 referred to by Ramaswami Nayudu must properly belong to the plaintiff in the suit, having regard to the recognition of his present claim by this Court, it need not be taken into consideration. Defendant 1 herself says that Rs. 200 was paid by her, whereas the mortgagee says that Rs. 285 was paid by her towards consideration for the adjustment of the maintenance suit. The transaction took place ten years before the date of the deposition, and a woman of the position, of Ammani Ammal cannot be expected to remember the fact so vividly as Ramasami Nayudu, P. W. 4, who is a man of business and who has actually received the amount. I therefore believe that defendant 1 must have paid Rs. 285 on 6th October 1905 to wards discharge of the encumbrance, and find that defendant 1 paid Rs. 285 to the mortgagee under the mortgage deed of 1899 for the purpose of discharging the encumbrance on the plaint properties, and that amount was paid on the date of Ex. 1-B, 6th October 1905. The mortgage deed carried interest at 9 per cent.

This second appeal coming on for final hearing after the return of the finding of the lower appellate Court upon the issue referred by this Court for trial, the Court delivered the following.

Judgment.—We accept the finding. The lower Court's decree will be modified by directing that Rs. 285 and interest from date of plaint shall be set off against the supplemental decree for mesne profits directed to be passed by the lower appellate Court's decree. The appellant will pay respondents' costs of this second appeal.

Judgment.—The facts in this case were of an ordinary character. Defendant's defence was not established because his evidence on certain points was deficient. On this account the lower Court at the first trial found against him. He afterwards applied for a review on the ground of discovery of fresh documentary evidence. The present petition is against the order granting it and decision passed on that evidence is in his favour. The only ground on which the review was asked for was that the fresh evidence could not be discovered earlier in spite of the use of due diligence. The lower Court did not find directly whether this was so. But, as in dealing with costs it said that defendant had not used due diligence, it presumably intended to find against him; and, as he adduced nothing on the point except a general assertion in his affidavit, there is no reason for rejecting this finding. It has mentioned no other reason for allowing the review.

I am asked however, with reference to Meduru Brahmayya v. Vedulu Yellamma (1), to assume that the lower Court had sufficient reason independently of anything on which defendant relied before it; and it is argued that, as such assumption is obligatory with reference to the authority cited, there can be no question of revision in connexion with this or any other case, in which the review has not been granted in consequence of a discovery of fresh evidence or contravention of R. 2. It may be conceded that with reference to a review granted for sufficient cause, the control to be exercised by an appellate or revisional Court need not be strict and, when the lower Court has evidently applied its mind to the circumstances, may be exercised with reference to every presumption in favour of its having done so correctly. But I do not think that the learned Judges meant more in the case cited, for if their decision is to justify defendant's contention here, it must mean that any Court is at liberty arbitrarily to hold a new trial of a case which it has decided or that its action cannot be scrutinized by superior authority, whether it has or has not considered whether such sufficient cause is available, since it is a presumption of law that it has done so. I cannot think that the learned Judges contemplated any such result. It may be observed that in any case their decision was given on O. 47, R. 7, Civil P. C., which is not applicable to Small Cause Courts and, though I should be inclined to follow the principles of that rule generally in dealing with Small Cause Court revision work, I do not think that they can be relied on as limiting the discretion, which the High Court possesses under S. 25, Act 9 of 1887, and which should not, in my opinion, be used except for substantial reason. Lastly, it is urged that the lower Court did in fact allege sufficient cause, when it observed that its decision was altered by the evidence newly admitted; and Bhagela Kuer v. Abdul Rahman (2) is relied on. I am not prepared to dissent from that dicision. But the principle involved must, in my opinion, be applied with reference to the circumstances of the case, the gravity of the consequence of not applying it and the character of the party's default. For otherwise it would mean that review could be claimed in every case, since ex-hypothesi the new evidence will alter or is expected to alter the result; and there would be no sort of finality in litigation. The present case presents, as I have said, no special features; and, in their absence, the lower Court, in my opinion, committed a material irregularity in allowing a review in the present case, simply because the fresh evidence would result in altering its decision, if that in fact was its reason.

The lower Court rejected the reason, for which the defendant asked for a review, and granted one either without any sufficient reason or, if it had one, without exercising any judicial discretion in respect of it. Its order, in these circumstances, cannot be sustained and must be set aside, its decree, dated 15th December 1916, being restored whth costs throughout, including those in the revision petition.

Judgment.—The question is whether O. 9, R. 9, Civil P. C., is applicable to the dismissal of an application for probate which has under S. 83, Probate and Administration Act, 5 of 1881, been treated as a suit. That section directs that the proceedings shall take, as nearly as may be, the form of a suit according to the provisions of Civil P. C. S. 55 of the same Act also applies these provisions to proceedings in relation to the grant of probate so far as the circumstances of the case admit. And we cannot find anything in the latter part of O. 9, R. 9, which is the relevant provision in the present connexion, which cannot be conveniently applied. Respondents however argue, firstly, that that part of the rule can be applied only when the first part debarring the plaintiff from a second suit can be applied also, and they rely on Ramani Debi v. Kumud Bandhu (1) for the position that it cannot. The decision met with some criticism in the referring order of Beaman, J., Kalyanchand Lalchand v. Sitabai Dhanasa (2), but we do not think it necessary at present to consider whether it is correct. For we can see no reason for treating the applicability of the latter portion of O. 9, R. 9, as conditional on that of the former or refusing effect to S. 55, Probate and Administration Act, on account of it. We therefore set aside the decision under Second Appeal No. 747 of 1916, Decided on 22nd March 1918, against the decree of Sub-Judge, Cocanada, in Appeal Suit No. 204 of 1911.

(a) Madras Estates Land Act (1908), Ss. 8 and 6—Effect of merger is that occupancy right ceases to exist—Whomsoever landholder thereafter lets land to, is not as tenant of occupancy raiyat but as raiyat of raiyati land—"Entire interests" are intended to exclude only such interests as those of mortgagee—Sub-tenant of occupancy raiyat is not raiyat.

The effect of an union or merger mentioned in S. 8 (1) is that the occupancy right ceases to exist; there is only melvaram left to the landholder, but the land still retains its character of raiyati land and is removed from the operation of contracts. Whomsoever the landholder thereafter lets the land to, he comes in not as a tenant of an occupancy raiyat but as a raiyat of raiyati lands within the meaning of S. 6 (1) of the Act. 11 I. C. 545, Expln. [P 116 C 1]

The words 'entire interests' in S. 8 (1) of the Act are intended to exclude only such interests as those of a mortgagee. A sub-tenant of anoccupancy raiyat is not a raiyat. [P 114 C 2; P 116 C 1]

Per Napier J.—Occupancy raiyats in an inam who are entitled to collect the rent of a portion of an estate by virtue of a transfer from the owner come within the definition of landholders under the Estates Land Act, inasmuch as they are persons owning part of an estate. [P 117 C 1]

The words 'entire estates' were inserted in S. 8 of the Act to apply where a mortgagee of the melvaram interest of the landholder acquired the rights of an occupancy tenant in a holding. In such a case he would not be prevented from holding the land as an occupancy raiyat by the fact that he had an interest in the melvaram. It provides for the converse of that dealt with in sub-S. 6, explanation, the object of that explanation and S. 8 being to prevent the loss of the rights of occupancy by a tenant purchasing the landlord's interest and to prevent the loss of the rights of occupancy by a landlord acquiring the interest of an occupancy tenant. [P 117 C 2]

(b) Madras Estates Land Act (1908), S. 8—Land part of estate—Lessor found to be landholder—Claiming of other rights by him is immaterial (obiter.)

Obiter.—Where the land is admittedly part of an estate and the lessor is found to be a landholder within the meaning of sub-S (5), S. 8 of the Act it is immaterial what other rights he may claim in the land, if there is a person holding for the purpose of agriculture raiyati land in that estate on condition of paying to such landholder the rent which is legally due on it. [P 119 C 2]

(c) Madras Estates Land Act (1908), S. 3, (2) (d)—Sub-S. 2 (d) has reference to grants recognized and confirmed by Government.

Section 3, sub-S. 2 (d), which excepts inams in which the melvaram and kudivaram are vested in the same person, has reference to grants recognized and confirmed by Government and it can be argued that in all other cases in which there is a person coming within the definition of a landholder and a person coming within the definition of a raiyat, such raiyat is given occupancy rights by the Act. [P 119 C 2]

V. Ramesam—for Appellants.

Narayanamurti and P. Somasundaram—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—This second appeal is by defendant 3 in the suit. The plaintiff-respondent 1 as found by both the lower Courts is purchaser of the rights of defendants 1 and 2 in the lands in question amounting to 18 odd acres, and he seeks to recover possession of the property from defendant 3. The lands were granted as a 'Nimebadi' Inam by the Rajah of Pittapur more than 100 years ago, but after the permanent settlement, to the ancestors of defendants 1 and 2, and both the District Munsif and the Subordinate Judge agree that the grant must be taken to have been of the melvaram alone.

The point for determination before us is whether defendant 3 is entitled to the benefit of S. 6, Madras Estates Land Act, and that depends upon the further question (a) whether the possession of defendant 3 on the date of the passing of the Act was or was not in the character of a mortgagee and if it was not, (b) whether defendant 3 had possession of the land as raiyat or merely as a sub-tenant of the inamdars. The land consists of 12 acres wet and 6 acres dry and it is found by both the Courts to be raiyati land, that is, cultivable land in an estate other than private land. With reference to the first question, defendant 3's connexion with the lands began on 27th February 1896, when defendants 1 and 2 borrowed money from him on a simple mortgage bond and let him into possession under a lease for 8 years (Ex. A.) In 1899 the inamdars borrowed an additional amount and executed a consolidated usufructuary mortgage (Ex. C); in 1900 they obtained from the defendant 3 a further loan and for this amount executed another usufructuary mortgage (Ex. D) and on the same date as Ex. D, defendants 1 and 2 granted a lease for 8 years (Ex. MM). If the dealings had stopped here, the question whether defendant 3's possession of the land was in the character of a raiyat or a mortgagee would, in my opinion, be one of considerable difficulty. But on 6th July 1904, defendants 1 and 2 paid off all that was due to defendant 3 and got back the mortgage deed. (See Receipt Ex. F.)

On the same day however they executed Ex. G, by which the lease Ex. MM. was kept in force. Therefore since 1904 the defendant 3's possession was that of a lessee and this is supported by the fact that in 1910 defendants 1 and 2 sued and recovered decrees for rent from defendant 3. This question was one of mixed law and fact and depended entirely on the effect of the above transactions. The Subordinate Judge, in holding against defendant 3 on this point, overlooked the fact that the mortgages were paid off in 1904 and he remained in possession wholly as lessee by virtue of Exs. G and MM. If defendant 3's possession were as in Bengal Indigo Company v. Roghobur Das (1) in part at least, not that of cultivator's only, but that of creditor's operating repayment of the debt due to them by means of the security, it would raise a question requiring serious consideration how far the judgment of the Privy Council could be distinguished on the basis of the provisions of the Madras Estates Land Act. If as I hold defendant 3 was not in possession as mortgagee on the date Madras Estates Land Act came into force, was he in possession as a raiyat?

"Raiyat" means a person who holds for the purpose of agriculture raiyati land in an estate on condition of paying to the landholder the rent which is legally due upon it. Now, that the land is raiyati land in an estate is conceded and that the plaintiff is a "landholder" is also conceded: see Upadrasta Venkata v. Devi Sitaramudu (2) and Kanti Venkanna v. Cheliani Rama Row Garu (3). There can be no doubt that defendant 3 holds the land on condition of paying to the plaintiff for its use and occupation some thing which will be "rent,"

"if the land is held by the former for the purpose of agriculture, a common requisite in the definitions both of raiyat and of rent."

The Subordinate Judge holds that a sub-tenant of an occupany raiyat is not a "raiyat" within the meaning of the law and in this, he is right. By S. 10 the rights of an occupancy raiyat are heritable and transferable and S. 19 contemplates a raiyat having tenants under him without forfeiting his right as a raiyat. A raiyat holds the land directly under a "landholder" or may be, under an ijaradar or farmer of rents; therefore a raiyat's tenant cannot have the status of a "raiyat." This is also evident from the whole scheme of the Act, which I shall presently examine in connexion with the next and the most important question in the case, whether defendants 1 and 2 combined in them the status both of a "landholder" and a "raiyat" and if so, what would be the result?

The grant itself is not forthcoming and it is not proved that by the grant both the melvaram and the kudivaram passed to the ancestors of defendants 1 and 2. Nor is there any direct evidence to show either that at the time of the grant the ancestors of defendants 1 and 2 were in possession of the lands as cultivating raiyats or acquired the kudivaram interest after the grant. It is not shown that they ever cultivated the lands themselves or through farm-servants. The lands were in fact always cultivated by tenants and the fact that defendants 1 and 2 and their ancestors were high caste Vaishnavites related to the priests of the Rajah of Pittapur and resided away from the village where the lands are situate, would tend to support the District Munsif's inference that their possession and enjoyment were in the character of landholders. The lower appellate Court on the other hand relies upon the facts that defendants 1 and 2 and their predecessors-in-title have been leasing the land for definite periods, changing the tenants from time to time and varying the rent at their pleasure and that defendant 3's ancestors had no connexion with the land, for his conclusion that the former owned the kudivaram as well as the melvaram. The above facts taken together, to my mind, lead to the conclusion, not that there were no raiyats on the land who had a permanent right of occupancy at the time the inam was granted to the ancestors of defendants 1 and 2, but that either no such right was insisted on against them or it must be taken to have been relinquished. It is observed by Wallis, C.J., in Zamindar of Chellapalli v. Rajalapati Somayya (4):

"In this connexion it is to be borne in mind that numerous instances have come before the Courts in which subsequent to the decision of Chockalinga Pillai v. Vythealinga Pandara Sunnady (5), zamindars succeeded in inserting in pattas and muchilikas terms negativing the existence of occupancy right and that one mode of effecting this purpose was to deal with the land as kambattam or home-farm land, even though it had never been cultivated by the zamindar himself and there was no intention of so cultivating it."

The mere fact that defendant 3, had not acquired occupancy right before this Act came into force, would not help the plaintiff. For it would not follow therefrom either that the plaintiff possessed the kudivaram or that defendant 3 could not acquire a permanent occupancy right by virtue of S. 6.

Now must the occupancy right always inhere in some one or other; if it is not in the tenant in actual occupation must it be presumed to belong to the landholder? This was so laid down by Miller, J., in Ponnuswamy Padayachi v. Karupudayan (6) with respect to "old waste," but Sadasiva Aiyar and Seshagiri Aiyar, JJ., dissented from this proposition in Upadrasta Venkata v. Devi Sitaramudu (2). It may be presumed that Miller, J., would have a fortiori applied the proposition in the case of ordinary cultivable raiyati land and I am not sure that Sadasiva Aiyar, J.'s dissent is not limited to the case of waste land. The answer has to be sought in the true interpretation and effect of S. 8, Madras Estates Land Act. That Act, whose object is to declare and amend the law relating to the holding of land in estates in this presidency, divides lands in a zamindari into two main classes (1) 'private' or home-farm land and (2) ryoti land including what is called 'old waste'. A zamindar or landholder may enjoy his 'private land' in any way he chooses and the Act does not interfere with his right to make any contracts he likes with reference to its possession and enjoyment. The 'private' lands of a zamindar are not capable of being added to, except by acquisition through especial proceedings instituted before the Collector in the nature of proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act. He can, on the other hand, if he so chooses, by contract or grant convert 'private' land into 'raiyati'. His power to deal with what is called 'old waste' is in certain respects larger than with respect to raiyati land. But in 'raiyati land' proper, which forms the bulk of the land in a zamindari, the rights are divided between two clases of persons, the zamindar or 'landholder' to be more accurate, who is ordinarily entitled only to collect a 'fair or equitable rent,' and persons who are entitled to direct occupation and possession of the land for purposes of cultivation, that is, the raiyats, on the condition of their paying such rent to the landholder. This is in accordance with the rulings of this Court in Vencata Mahalakshmamma v. Ramojagi (7), Venkatanarasimha Naidu v. Dandamudi Kotayya (8) and Cheekati Zamindar v. Ranasooru Dhora (9), which expounded the law as it existed before the Act. The Act has taken every precaution to uphold the two distinct interests in raiyati land, that is, the landholder's right to collect rent or 'melvaram' as it is called, and the raiyats' right to occupation for purposes of cultivation or 'kudivaram'.

The next question arises, what happens if the landholder acquires the occupancy right as well? Shephard and Subramania Aiyar, JJ., held in Cheekati Zamindar v. Ranasooru Dhora (9) before the passing of the Act that even in such a case a raiyat who is admitted to possession of the land must be presumed to hold it on the same terms as an ordinary raiyat in a zamindari, viz., that he or his heirs would be prima facie entitled to occupy the land for purposes of cultivation so long as they were willing to pay just or customary rent. Such a raiyat was not to be treated as a tenant from year to year except that where there was an express contract the rights of the parties would be governed by such a contract. The Act however has gone further in favour of the raiyat except in the case of acquisition of kudivaram interest by an inamdar falling within the description of Cl. (d), sub-S. 2, S. 3, i. e., an inamdar whose grant has been confirmed or recognized by the British Government, which is not the case here. S. 8 (1) enacts:

"Whenever before or after the commencement of this Act the entire interests of the landholder and the occupancy raiyat in any land in the holding have become united by transfer, succession or otherwise in the same person, such person shall have no right to hold the land as a raiyat but shall is hold it as a landholder".

Then sub-S. (3) says:

"the merger of the occupancy right under sub-Ss. (1) and (2) shall not have the effect of converting the raiyati land into private land."

The effect of such an union therefore shortly is that the occupancy right ceases to exist; there is only the melvaram left in the landholder, but the land still retains its character of raiyati land and is removed, generally speaking, from the operation of contracts. Thus, whomsoever the landholder thereafter lets the land to, he comes in not as a tenant of an occupancy raiyat but as a raiyat of raiyati land within the meaning of S. 6 (1). The lower appellate Court holds that S. 8 (1) does not apply, because in its opinion defendants 1 and 2 could not be said to hold the 'entire interests' of the landholder as they were the grantees of a portion only of the melvaram. But the mere fact that defendants 1 and 2 as inamdars have to pay something by way of quit rent to the zamindar cannot make their interests in the land as landholders anything less than the 'entire interests', since the raiyat has to pay rent to defendants 1 and 2 alone as 'landholders.' The words 'entire interests' were apparently intended to exclude such interests as those of a mortgagee. The Subordinate Judge has also relied on Marapu Tharalu v. Telukula Neelakanta Behara (10), which lays down that the ruling in Cheekati Zamindar v. Ranasoora Dhora (9) as to the presumption that raiyats of zamindari have a permanent occupancy right does not apply to the tenants of inamdars. But he overlooks the fact that the above case was not governed by the Madras Estates Land Act. My conclusion therefore is that even if defendants 1 and 2 had acquired the kudivaram right by succession, transfer, surrender or otherwise, by virtue of S. 8 (1) they retained the land only as landholders and defendant 3 having been in possession of it as a raiyat at the passing of the Act, acquired occupancy right therein under S. 6.

(10) [1907] 30 Mad. 502.

The decree of the Subordinate Judge will therefore be reversed and the appeal will be remanded to him for enquiry as to the amount of rent due to the plaintiff from the date of the suit to the end of June 1917 and he will pass a decree for such amount. Respondent 1 will pay the appellants' costs of this appeal and each party will bear his own costs in the lower Courts.

Napier, J. — The appellant is defendant 3 in this suit which was brought by the plaintiff to recover possession of the plaint lands and mesne profits from defendant 3. The plaintiff is a purchaser from defendants 1 and 2, and defendant 3 the present appellant, held the land under defendants 1 and 2 and now claims a permanent right of occupancy under the Madras Estates Land Act. The lower appellate Court, after the framing of fresh issues on remand, stated the points for consideration as follows :

"Whether defendants 1 and 2 had melvaram as well as kudivaram rights in the plaint lands and were to be treated as landholders or raiyats within the Act ; whether defendant 3 acquired the rights of permanent occupancy in the plaint lands under the Act," and decided both contentions against the appellant. Its finding on the second point was that defendant 3 held the lands as usufructuary mortgagee, and as such was not a raiyat within the meaning of the Act. It further held that defendants 1 and 2 had both warams in the suit lands and were thus raiyats within the meaning of the Act. I will deal with the latter finding first. The process by which the lower appellate Court arrived at this finding is as follows : It found that the plaint lands were a post settlement Nimebadi grant from the Rajah of Pittapur to the ancestors of defendants 1 and 2, that by that grant the latter were not created tenants of jerayati lands but that the grant was one of a portion of the melvaram and that therefore they were landholders within the meaning of the Estates Land Act as contended by defendant 3. It then proceeded to consider the question whether they were also kudivaram raiyats, and then found that the suit lands had been in the possession of defendants 1 and 2 for the last one hundred years or more and had been leased out by them periodically to cultivating tenants, the tenants and the amount of rent varying from time to time, and that therefore prior to the Act no cultivating tenant had any permanent right of occupancy. On this finding, the Court assumed that the permanent right of occupancy was in defendants 1 and 2, and that therefore defendant 3, the tenant in possession at the date of the passing of the Act, could not acquire those rights. The logical result of such a proposition as this would be to render the provisions of the Madras Estates Land Act absolutely nugatory ; for if the fact that the cultivating tenants had not at the date of the Act a permanent right of occupancy showed that a permanent right of occupancy existed in their lessor, then obviously no tenant could acquire such a right under the Act. During the course of the argument we asked the learned vakil for the respondent for authority for that proposition, and he was constrained to admit that so far as the zamindar himself was concerned, no Court had ever held that the absence of occupancy rights in the tenants necessarily indicated that the occupancy right was in the zamindar and thus deprived the tenants of the benefit of the Act. He contended however that the position of defendants 1 and 2 was different from that of the zamindar, first, on the ground that they were not inamdars as found by the lower appellate Court, but ordinary jerayati tenants.

With regard to this contention which was not very strongly pressed, I do not think it necessary to say more than that the name and history of this tenure clearly proves it to be, as found by both the lower Courts, as inam. He relied however most strongly on the reasoning of the lower appellate Court above set out, contending that the fact that the lessors were inamdars and not a zamindar made all the difference, and that they were rightly held to have the permanent occupancy right. There can be no question that defendants 1 and 2 come within the definition of landholder, inasmuch as they are persons owning a part of an estate in that they are entitled to collect the rent of a portion of an estate by virtue of a transfer from the owner. This was found by the lower appellate Court and is not disputed by the plaintiff. Coming to the kudivaram interest, there is no finding by the lower appellate Court as to when this was acquired by defendants 1 and 2. But the Court seems to assume that the fact that they were leasing the lands to their tenants at pleasure indicates that they owned those rights. It was contended by the appellant that even if this was so, S. 8 of the Act would prevent the inamdar holding the dual position, the section being as follows:

> "Whenever before or after the commencement of this Act, the entire interests of the landholder and the occupancy raiyat in any land in the holding have become united by transfer, succession or otherwise in the same person, such person shall have no right to hold the land as a raiyat but shall hold it as a landholder."

The Subordinate Judge held however that the entire interest had not become united, taking the view that the word "landholder" meant the whole interest of the zamindar; and that, as the inam was only a portion of an estate subject to the payment of kattubadi to the zamindar, there was no union of the entire interest of the landholder and of the occupancy raiyat. The lower appellate Court has fallen into an error here. We are not concerned with the interest of the zamindar. The word "landholder" in the section has reference to the person claiming the interest, and it has never been disputed, and indeed has been specifically found by the Court, that defendants 1 and 2 were landholders within the meaning of the Act. In so far as this holding is concerned, defendants 1 and 2, as inamdars, held the entire interest of a landholder's right. The object of the section was to prevent the extinction of existing rights of permanent occupancy. Such rights were, of course, well recognized before the Act, the object of the Act being to make them universal. The word "entire" was inserted in the Act to apply where a mortgagee of the melvaram interest of the landholder acquired the rights of an occupancy tenant in a holding. In such a case he would not be prevented from holding the land as an occupancy raiyat by the fact that he had an interest in the melvaram. It provides for the converse case of that dealt with in sub-S. 6, explanation, the object of that explanation and S. 8 being to prevent the loss of the rights of occupancy by a tenant purchasing the landlord's interest and to prevent the loss of rights of occupancy by a landlord acquiring the interest of an occupancy tenant: vide Muthu Reddi v. Muthu Venkatapathi Reddi (11).

There still remains however the question: "Were defendants 1 and 2 ever occupancy tenants with a permanent right of occupancy?" As far as I am aware, the only section in the Act which specifically deals with the kudivaram right is S. 3 (2), Cl. (d), describing one class of estate:

"Any village of which the land revenue alone has been granted in inam to a person not owning the kudivaram thereof provided that the grant has been made, confirmed or recognized by the British Government."

This has reference to inams granted by the State or persons who claim the right to make grants prior to the permanent settlement, which grants have been confirmed by the Inam Commission, and was meant to exempt cases where a revenue inam had been granted to persons already in occupation and cultivation of the land. It is not contended that this land comes within the exception indicated by this clause, this being a part of the class of estates covered by Cl. (a). The District Munsif, in finding that the inam was only of revenue, relies strongly on the fact that the ancestors of defendants 1 and 2 were Gnatis of the family Gurus of the Rajah, and states it to be highly improbable that they ever cultivated their holdings themselves. He further finds that no such cultivation by them has been proved, this finding of non-cultivation not being disputed here. The lower appellate Court considers this as immaterial, because defendants 1 and 2 had been in possession for the last 100 years or more and were leasing out lands periodically to changing tenants, this latter fact negativing tenants' occupying rights. This may be so and it is not argued before us that the tenants had occupancy rights before the Act, all that is contended being that the absence of occupancy rights in the tenants does not indicate occupancy rights in the landlords, defendants 1 and 2, so as to debar any cultivating tenant from acquiring occupancy rights under the Act. The learned Judge relies on a decision in Gullapalli Bhadrayya v. Gullapalli Venkataratnam (12). The point for decision in that case was, not whether the inamdar was a raiyat himself, but whether the tenants had occupancy rights at the date of the suit, the suit being prior to the Estates Land Act. The Court held that the presumption was that the inam grant was only of the melavaram right, the zamindar himself presumably only having that right, and that the fact that the inamdar was ejecting the tenants did not prove the absence of occupancy right in the tenants. The claim there went far beyond that claimed here, and the case does not support the learned Judge's view.

To my mind the true test is cultivation. This was the view taken by Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in an elaborate judgment in Upadrasta Venkata v. Devi Sitaramudu (2), a case decided by him and Seshagiri Aiyar, J. He was dealing with waste lands in an inam and said as follows:

"The inamdar, so far as the waste lands are concerned, cannot be considered to have the kudivaram right in them, though he could create kudivaram interest in a waste land by letting it to a cultivator and could have (before the Estates Land Act) converted it into a private land by cultivating it through his home-farm servants and thus got the kudivaram right vested in himself. Till he does either of these things, the lands would lie waste, owned by the inamdar . . . . . but he could not be said to have the kudivaram right in it, kudivaram implying direct contact by cultivation with the soil," and on p. 897 (of 38 Mad.) the learned Judge says:

"When the inamdar afterwards granted the lands for cultivation without giving the cultivators permanent occupancy rights and when he changed the cultivators from time to time, it cannot be said that thereby the inamdar himself got any permanent occupancy or kudivaram right in the land, as there is no evidence to prove that he let them expressly as his private or as home-farm lands. The occupancy right, that is, the right to occupay and cultivate, was enjoyed by cultivating tenants from time to time though they did not get a permanent occupancy right thereby."

I have pointed out in a case reported as Tallapragada Subba Row v. Gopisetti Narayanaswami Naidu (13) that to allow a person other than the cultivating tenant to intervene between the landholder and the cultivating tenant on a claim of kudivaram right would be to frustrate the whole object of the Act, and for the purpose of arriving at the definition of the word "Raiyat" by construing the rent section, I said that if a tenant is taking from the lands its kudivaram interest and paying the melvaram to the landholder, then, whether he cultivates the land himself or is compelled by circumstances to have it cultivated for him, he is so paying money for the purpose of agriculture; and applying that test, I declined to accept the proposition that a person who had brought at public auction an interest in certain lanka lands from the zamindar for five years and let it to cultivators, was a raiyat within the meaning of the Act. It seems clear to me that defendants 1 and 2, the inamdars, are not paying rent to the zamindar and it seems to me therefore to follow that they cannot be raiyats. If they are not raiyats but have this kudivaram interest, the result would be that no persons cultivating that land could ever acquire a permanent right of occupancy and that the object of the Act, namely, to grant permanent rights of occupancy to persons cultivating ryoti land, would, in this case, also be frustrated.

It is argued by Mr. P. Narayanamurthy that this view is incorrect, Miller, J., having taken a different view in an earlier case. The case is reported as Ponusawmy Padayachi v. Karupudayan (6). The learned Judge said that on the fact being found that the tenant had no occupancy right, the presumption arises that the occupancy right was either granted to, or acquired by, the inamdar. I am unable to see why any such presumption should be made. Unless the idea of the right to cultivate is to be essential to kudivaram right, I do not see what meaning is to be given to that phrase and what difference there is in essence between such a right and melvaram right. The earlier cases, in which the analogy between a zamindari raiyat and a Government raiyat was traced by the late Muthusawami Iyer, J., and Subramania Iyer, J., laid stress on the position of the zamindar as the owner of the melvaram corresponding to the Government ownership of the melvaram in raiyatwari land and the position of the zamindari tenant as holding the right to cultivate just as the raiyatwari tenant has his right to hold and cultivate. To create a permanent right of occupancy under the name of kudivaram right in inamdars to whom the melvaram alone has been granted, simply on the ground that they have been shown to have been letting the land to cultivating tenants for many years, is to give to them a right which does not naturally arise out of the relative positions of the parties and is unknown where the zamindar alone is concerned. In his case the fact that he has been proved to have let the tenants into possession from the commencement, was, prior to the Act, sufficient to establish that the tenants had then no permanent right of occupancy, but it has never been suggested that these facts vested a permanent right of occupancy in him, created him a ryot and thus prevented the ryots from acquiring occupancy right under the Act. I do not see why the fact that he has assigned a part of his melvaram rights to inamdars who are not shown ever to have cultivated the lands themselves should put them in any better position than he himself would have been. From the date of the inam, they would as a matter of course, exercise the rights that had previously been vested in the zamindar, such rights including the letting of the lands to cultivators, and I can see nothing proved to have been done by them beyond what they would thus have been entitled to do.

In this view I am of opinion that defendants 1 and 2 had not kudivaram interest in the land in the sense that they had a permanent right of occupancy. I am further strongly inclined to hold, though I do not think it necessary to decide the point, that where the land is admittedly part of an estate and the lessor is found to be a landholder within the meaning of sub-S. 5, it is immaterial what other rights he may claim in the land, if there is a person holding for the purpose of agricultural raiyati land in that estate on condition of paying to such landholder the rent which is legally due on it. As pointed earlier in the course of my judgment, S. 3, sub-S. 2 (d), which excepts inams in which the melvaram and kudivaram are vested in the same person, has reference to grants recognized and confirmed by Government and it can certainly be argued that all other cases in which there is a person coming within the definition of a landholder and a person coming within the definition of a raiyat, such raiyat is given occupancy rights by the Act.

gagee, could not be a raiyat within the meaning of the Act. The learned Judge gives no authority for this proposition, but it is sought to be supported in this Court on two cases from Calcutta and one of the High Court of Allahabad. The case of Bengal Indigo Company v. Raghobur Das (1) was a decision of the Privy Council confirming the decision of the Calcutta High Court on the construction of a zarpeshgi lease and turned on the language of the Bengal Rent Law, Act 10 of 1859, and the Bengal Tenancy Act 8 of 1885. S. 5 of the latter Act provides that in determining whether a tenant is a tenure holder or a raiyat, the Court shall have regard to the purpose for which the right of tenancy was originally acquired, and their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the leases in question were not mere contracts for the cultivation of the land let, but that they were also intended to constitute and did constitute a real and valid security to the tenant for the principal sums which he had advanced and interest thereon. The tenants' possession under them was, in part at least, not that of cultivators only, but that of creditors operating repayment of the debt due to them by means of security. We are asked under an entirely different Act to apply the decision of the Board to the facts of this case. The first answer is that we have not got those words in the sections of our Act, sub-S. 15, S. 3 defining a raiyat as a person who holds for the purpose of agriculture raiyati land on condition of paying to the landholder the rent which is legally due upon it; and it is the policy of this Act which we are to enforce and not the policy of the Bengal Tenancy Act. I am certainly prepared to accept the proposition that a mortgage of the land by a landholder to a person who was not in any sense of the word a cultivator, the income to be derived from the land being applied in discharge of the interest on the mortgage would not create the mortgagee a raiyat. This is in accordance with the view which I had taken of the case above referred to and my reasoning in this judgment, for such a procedure could be utilized by a landlord to prevent permanent right of occupancy being acquired by the actual cultivating tenant.

But where a person has bona fide taken the land for cultivation and is cultivating it, the fact that he has advanced money to his landlord and sets off his rent against the interest due from the landlord cannot, in the absence of the words in the Bengal Act, prevent such cultivating tenant becoming an occupancy raiyat under the Act The case of Altaf Ali Khan v. Lalta Prasad (14) did not turn on any question of the right of occupancy and is therefore of no assistance to us. The history of this tenure is as follows: Defendant 3 was admitted by defendants 1 and 2 to the land in the year 1896, and on the same day he advanced money on a mortgage bond to defendant 2. The tenancy was created by exchange of patta and muchilika for eight years, the tenant taking 20 acres of land agreeing to pay a cist of Rs. 210 per year for the purposes of cultivation. He agrees to pay the kattubadi cist and the local cess payable by defendants 1 and 2 out of the first crop realized by him, to pay Rs. 30 in cash to defendants 1 and 2 and credit the balance of cist towards the complete discharge of the interest due on the mortgage deed. Three years later the landlord borrowed a further sum of Rs. 500, the original sum having been Rs. 500, on a mortgage. This document recites that the mortgagee is in possession under the cowle of 1896, Ex. A, and makes the following provision for the discharge of the interest. The future cist due is to be credited towards the interest due on the whole sum of Rs. 1,000, the balance being taken towards the principal. The document is called a mortgage deed with possession.

The effect of this mortgage is to cancel the provision in Ex. A under which a certain amount was to be paid in cash and to provide for a discharge of both principal and interest from the rent. The next document, dated 21st August 1900, (Ex. D) recites that Rs. 100 is due on the mortgage Ex. C, that the landlord has borrowed another Rs. 100 and provides for the repayment of principal and interest in nine years. At the same time the landlord gave a patta and the tenant executed a muchilika Ex. MM for the lands, reducing the cist of Rs. 210 agreed by Ex. A to Rs. 150. Then come Exs. F and G executed on 6th July 1904, just prior to the date when the lease under Ex A would expire. Ex. F is a receipt in full discharge of the amounts due on the mortgages. Ex. G is a muchilika by defendant 3 under which he agreed to pay a cist of Rs. 188 for the 20 acres with the addition of another 6 acres of garden land for a single year and after the expiry of that year, he should continue to hold under the muchilika of 1900, Ex. MM. It is not disputed that the patta and muchilika evidenced by Ex. MM were in force at the date of the Act, and it is further in evidence that defendants 1 and 2 treated defendant 3 as their tenant, for they brought a suit against him to recover the amount of Rs. 336 due under Ex. MM. This is proved by Ex. L. Defendant 3 set up that present defendants 1 and 2, the plaintiffs in that suit, had agreed to sell the land, and Mr. P. Narayanamurti contends that Ex. F of 1904, which purported to acknowledge receipt of the whole of the mortgage money due, was a nominal document in connexion with this sale. The District Munsif held that as there had been no registered sale deed, the sale was not complete and that therefore the relation of landlord and tenant still subsisted as contended by defendants 1 and 2 in that suit.

This is the history of the transactions between the parties and I can find nothing in these documents which supports the finding of the District Judge, that defendant 3's tenancy under Ex. A merged in his right as a usufructuary mortgagee under Ex. C and that from the date of Ex. C his position as a mere tenant was at an end. Ex. MM and the contention of defendants 1 and 2 in the suit, Ex. L, are a complete answer to this finding, and a further answer is to be found in the fact that in this very suit itself plaintiff, the assignee of defendants 1 and 2, sued defendant 3 in ejectment on the muchilika Ex. MM. He has not sought to recover possession of the land from the defendant as a usufructuary mortgagee, but alleged that he was entitled to possession on termination of the period of the lease in Ex. MM. It is not contended before us that defendant 3 was not cultivating the land. Under the pattas and muchilikas the land was expressly let to him for cultivation, and I do not think that is it now open to the plaintiff to resile from the position taken up by defendants 1 and 2 in Ex. L and in his plaint in this suit, and seek to treat defendant 3 as a usufructuary mortgagee, which in fact he never was simply because the legislature has intervened and given him rights which were not contemplated at the date of the patta and muchilika.

Mr. P. Narayanamurthi has urged that if he is not entitled to recover the land, the Courts will give him a decree for rent due. The appeal will be allowed with costs and a decree for rent to be ascertained by the Subordinate Court will be passed. The decree will be in the terms proposed by my learned brother.

Moidin and others—Defendants—Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 364 of 1917, Decided on 26th February 1918, against decree of Sub-Judge, South Canara, in Appeal Suit No. 73 of 1916.

(a) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 70—Usufructuary mortgage by plaintiff of warg land with adjoining kumki land—Mortgagee in possession over 12 years—Patta issued for warg land alone and kumki land assigned to plaintiff—Plaintiff's suit to eject mortgagee from kumki land—Mortgagee's possession of kumki land held did not create title by adverse possession—Mortgage did not operate on interest acquired by plaintiff in kumoki land—Kumki land held not accession—Mortgagee was not protected by Trusts Act (1882), S. 90.

Plaintiff's predecessor-in title mortgaged usufructuarily in 1890 certain warg land and kumki land adjoining it to defendants' predecessor-in-interest. The mortgagee and his heirs were in possession up to 1914. Meanwhile, in the settlement of 1902 patta was issued for the warg land alone and the kumki land, which was classed as waste poramboke, was assigned on darkhast to the plaintiff in 1911. On a suit by the plaintiff to eject the defendant from the kumki land in 1914:

Held: (1) that the paramount right of Government over the kumki land which was assigned to the plaintiff prevailed over the rights of the mortgagee whose enjoyment between 1890 and 1914 could not confer on him any adverse title as against the plaintiff: (2) that the mortgage of 1890 did not operate on the interest acquired by the plaintiff by the darkhast grant of 1911, as no proof had been let in of any erroneous representation by the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage or of the mortgagee having acted on any such representation to his detriment (3) that the suit land could not be treated as an accession to the mortgaged property under S. 70, T. P. Act, as it was at the absolute disposal of Government:

(4) that the defendants were not protected by S. 90, Trusts Act, as the plaintiff did not obtain the suit land on darkhast as representing all persons interested in the property. [P 123 C 2]

(b) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 43—S. 43 is branch of law of estoppel.

S. 43, should be treated as a branch of the law of estoppel. [P 123 C 1]

B. Sitarama Row—for Appellant.

H. Balakrishna Row—for Respondents.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The plaintiff is the appellant. The plaintiff owns a warg land marked 17/27 in the plan Ex. C, as the reversionary heir of the husband of one Devamma. Devamma granted a usufructuary mortgage Ex. A in 1890, not only of the warg land 17/27, but also of plaint item (1) which was the slope of a hill adjoining the warg land. Item (1) is marked A, A-1 and B in the plaint. It is well known that in South Kanara, warg lands have what are called kumki rights over a certain extent of adjoining waste land. Hence Devamma usufructuarily mortgaged in 1890 both her warg land and the plaint item (1) in dispute and put her mortgagee in possession, and the said mortgagee and his successors-in-title including defendant 1 have been in possession of item (1) along with the warg lands all along from 1890. In the settlement of 1902, patta was issued for the warg land alone, item (1) being classed as waste poramboke.

The plaintiff, who owned the equity of redemption in the lands usufructuarily mortgaged, took advantage of the fact that item (1), a portion of the lands, belonged to the Government and was at its absolute disposal (though under the darkhast rules the revenue officers charged with the duty of granting lands on darkhast were directed to prefer the neighbouring wargdars), applied for the darkhast grant of item (2) in 1910 and obtained a grant of it to himself in March 1911: see Ex. B. The plaintiff thereupon brought this suit against the mortgagee, defendant 1 (who died after suit and whose legal representatives are defendants 2 to 5) for possession of the plaint item (1) on the strength of his title under the above darkhast grant. The plaintiff cleverly omitted in his plaint all mention of the fact that his predecessor-in-title (Devamma) had usufructuarily mortgaged the plaint item (1) also in 1890 to defendant 1's predecessor-in title and that defendant 1 and his predecessors-in-title had been in possession of plaint item (1) along with other lands as usufructuary mortgagees from 1890. On the other hand he told a falsehood in the plaint that the defendants trespassed upon the Government land item (1) only in December 1910, that he was in possession of it before and that he was granted the land by Government, while he was so in possession of it on behalf of a stanom.

The plaintiff also sued for recovery of plaint item (2) (ridge bunds on which trees stand and called kattupannis) alleging that the defendants unlawfully trespassed at the same time (in December 1910) on those kattupani lands also. The real truth was that these kattupannis were also included in the mortgage of 1890 (except the portion marked XY in the plan) and have all along been in the possession of the mortgagee and his successors-in-title. The District Munsif gave a decree to the plaintiff for the portion XY of the kattupannis (to which the defendats laid no claim) and dismissed the plaintiff's suit in other respects, on the ground that the plaintiff in order to evade his liability to give compensation for the house built on item (1) by defendant 1 (which plaintiff would have to do if the plaintiff sued to redeem item (1) and the warg land and the kattupannis except X Y on the mortgage of 1890) has brought this suit in ejectment as regards items (1) and (2) alone, excluding the warg land, making the false allegation of trespass in December 1890 as regards the items 1 and 2. The Subordinate Judge on appeal confirmed the lower Court's decree.

Nothing was alleged by Mr. B. Sitarama Row for the appellant (plaintiff) which could induce us to differ from the concurrent findings of fact by the lower Courts. He however strongly relied upon the question of law, namely, that item (1) being merely a kumki land attached to the warg land, the Government was entitled to ignore the mortgage made in 1890 by the wargdar so far as regards the kumki land, that it was entitled to grant the kumki land to whomsoever it pleased, that the plaintiff as such grantee acquired a title to it as owner against defendant 1 (the usufructuary mortgagee under the wargdar) and that defendant 1 was not entitled to rely upon the right of possession granted by the wargdar (under the mortgage) of the kumki land as against the right of possession granted by the Government (under the darkhast proceedings) to the plaintiff. Having regard to the decision in Hattikudur Narain Rao v. Andar Sayad Abbas Sahib (1), approved in Swaminatha Mudali v. Saravana Mudali (2), and to the rights of the Government in waste land in South Kanara as settled by the Full Bench decision in Secy. of State v. Manjeshwar Krishnayya (3). I do not see my way to get round the above contention of Mr. Sitarama Row. The lower appellate Court relied on the fact that defendant and his predecessors had been enjoying the land item (1) as mortgages for more than 12 years, that is, between 1890 and 1914, when this suit was brought. But such enjoyment cannot confer any adverse title on the mortgagees as against the Government and when the Government exercised their paramount right in 1911, the plaintiff got a clean title. The District Munsif relied on S. 43, T. P. Act, but S. 43 has been treated as a branch of the law of estoppel: see Pandiri Bangaram v. Karumoory Subbaraju (4), Jadu Bans Upadhiya v. Sheojit Singh (5) and Rashmoni Dasi v. Surja Kanta Roy Chowdhry (6). No proof of any erroneous representation by the mortgagor at the time of Ex. A (the mortgage of 1890) or of the mortgagee's having acted on any such representation to his detriment has been proved and I cannot agree with the District Munsif that by reason of S. 43, T. P. Act, the mortgage of 1890 operated on the interest which the plaintiff acquired by his darkhast grant of 1911.

The respondents' learned vakil Mr. Balakrishna Row attempted to support the decision of the lower Courts on a ground not put forward in the judgments of the lower Courts, namely, that under S. 70, T. P. Act, any accession to the mortgaged property becomes part of the security and that the plaint item (1) should be treated as such an succession to the mortgaged warg land. Having regard to the illustrations to S. 70, T. P. Act, I am unable to hold that the kumki land at the absolute disposal of the Government and granted by them to the owner of the equity of redemption of the neighbouring warg land can be treated as an accession to the said warg land. Mr. Balakrishna Row relied also upon S. 90, Trusts Act, but the provisions of that section apply to tenants for life, co-owners, mortgagees and similar persons who avail themselves of their position to obtain benefits for themselves in "derogation of the rights of other persons interested" or "as representing all persons interested." Here it was the mortgagor who obtained the grant of the neighbouring waste land from the Government, and not the mortgagee, and there is nothing to show that he obtained it as representing all persons interested in the mortgaged property.

In the result, I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that the decisions of the lower Courts must be modified by giving judgment for the plaintiff for item (1) also, the defendants being allowed six month's time to remove the improvements made by them on that land. This is not a case for allowing any costs at all to the plaintiff, who made dishonest suppressions and false allegations in his plaint as regards both item (1) and item (2) and as he has failed in respect of the greater part of item (2) in all the Courts, I would direct the plaintiff to bear his own costs throughout and pay out half of defendants' costs throughout.

(a) Decree—Execution—Absence of consideration does not deprive assignee of decree of right to execute.

The absence of consideration for an assignment of a decree will not, provided the assignment is not a sham transaction, deprive the assignee of his right to execute the decree.: 43 I. C. 801, Foll. [P 125 C 1]

A certificate of satisfaction under O. 21, R. 2, Civil P. The record of such satisfaction by the Court is only a formal matter which may be made at any time or even be treated as having been made. The absence of such a formal record will not nullify the effect of the certificate, which alone is sufficient to enable the Court to recognize the payment. [P 125 C 2]

K. S. Ramabhadra Ayyar—for Appellant.

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar—for Respondents.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The 3rd and 4th Plaintiffs' (decree holders') assignee is the appellant before us. The material facts may be shortly stated thus: Plaintiffs 2 and 3 were partners of the joint decree-holders with the appellant's assignors, namely, the plaintiffs 3 and 4. The decree was passed in favour of all the four plaintiffs in 1908 for a certain sum of money. There was an adjustment of the decree amount between the defendants and plaintiffs at Rs. 485 and that sum was paid up to all the four plaintiffs in 1909 by the defendants through one Muthia Thevan. The decree was thus really satisfied but a certificate of satisfaction was not filed by all or any of the four plaintiffs till December 1911 and hence the executing Court could not recognize the satisfaction till then.

In 1910 the four plaintiffs dissolved the partnership and plaintiffs 2 and 1 respectively executed release deeds in February 1910 and February 1911 in respect of the pertnership assets and liabilities. As all the four partners knew well that the decree debt due by the defendants had been really satisfied in 1909, plaintiffs 1 and 2 never could have thought when they executed their release deeds that the partnership owned any interest in the decree and could not have intended to transfer any rights under the decree to plaintiffs 3 and 4. (The release deeds A and B have not been translated and printed.) Plaintiffs 3 and 4 treating the decree however as still alive and treating themselves as the sole owners of the decree, fraudulently assigned the decree to the appellant (execution petitioner) for no consideration in May 1911. The appellant first applied for execution in July 1911 (just within three years of the decree). Plaintiffs 1 and 2 got notice and filed counter-petitions in December 1911, which contained certificates of satisfaction of the decree by payment of Rs. 485 in 1909. The appellant did not prosecute that petition and had it dismissed in 1912. Then he filed the present execution petition in November 1913 for a warrant of arrest against defendant 1 for recovery of the decree amount. The lower appellate Court (confirming the decision of the District Munsif) refused to recognize the appellant as transferee of decree and dismissed the execution application, on the above facts and on the view that the certificates of plaintiffs 1 and 2 were legally valid certificates of satisfaction which discharged the decree.

The appellant's learned vakil (Mr. K. S. Ramabhadra Aiyar) strenuously argued the fooling points (each of which I shall deal with below immediately after stating it). First contention: The lower appellate Court was wrong in going into the question of consideration for the assignment of the decree to the appellant. This argument seems wellfounded: see Chellam Chetti v. Seeni Chetti (1), which decides that, provided the assignment is not a sham transaction, the absence of consideration will not deprive the assignee of his right to execute the decree. Second contention: The so called certificates of plaintiffs 1 and 2 are not in proper form and ought not to be treated as certificates of satisfaction under O. 21, R. 2.

There is no substance in this contention as a certificate under O. 21, R. 2, of the decree-holder need not be in any particular form and even the mention of the payment to the Court at any time by the decree-holder, say in his execution petition, is a sufficient certificate: see Mohamed Silar Sahib & Co. v. Nabi Khan Sahib (2) and Mathar Dravia Sahaya Ela Nidhi Co., Ltd., In re (3). Third contention: As no record of satisfaction was made by the Court on those certificates, they are legally useless. Mr. Ramabhadra Aiyar relied on certain passages in the judgments in Moti Ram v. Hannu Prasad (4) and Periasami v. Krishna Ayyan (5) and other cases for his contention that it is the record of satisfaction made by the Court on the decree-holder's certificate that discharges the decree and not the certificate itself. In the old Civil Proceduro Code, S. 258, Para. 1, corresponding to O. 21, R. 2. sub-R. (1), there was no express provision for any record of the certificate of satisfaction when given by the decree-holder, though the mofussil Courts usually endorsed "recorded" on such certificates. Where the decree-holder did not certify but the judgment-debtor applied within 90 days to the Court to send notice to the decree-holder to show cause why payment or adjustment should not be recorded as certified, it was enacted that the Court, on his failure to show cause, "shall record the same" (that is as certified). Para. 3, S. 258, which was intended to provide for the executing Court not recognizing payment, out of Court except in the two cases referred to in the previous, two paragraphs, mentions expressly one of the cases, namely, the payment or adjustment being "certified as aforesaid," that is, by the decree-holder under para. 1, and does not expressly add "or recorded by the Court as certified" under para. 2.

Evidently the word "certified" in para. 3 was intended to mean "certified" or "recorded by Court as certified." The new Code supplies in sub-R. 3 the omitted words "or recorded." Mr. Ramabhadra Aiyar's argument that because the 1st sub-rule in O. 21, R. 2, has added the words "and the Court shall record the same", that is, the decree-holder's certificate of adjustment. the words "or recorded" in sub-R. 3 must be read as "and recorded" where there is a certificate by the decree-holder under sub-R. 1, is ingenious but wholly inadmissible. In the case of sub-R. 2, there is no certificate at all but only a record by the Court as certified, and the expression in sub-R. 3 "certified or recorded", if read "certified and recorded", will make sub-R. 2 wholly ineffectual to protect the judgment-debtor. The neglect by the Court of the duty expressly imposed on it (under sub-R. 1, O. 21, R. 2, of the new Code) of recording the decree-holder's certificate cannot prejudice the judgment-debtor and it cannot be argued successfully that the record also by the Court is required under sub-R. 3 before the payment or adjustment could be recognized. The record by the Court being a formal matter, of course, may be made at any time or even be treated as having been made. In the cases of Mahomed Silar Sahib & Co. v. Nabi Khan Sahib (2) and Mathar Dravia Sahaya Ela Nidhi Co., In re (3), no such record by the Court of the certificate of payment could have been made (as the payment was mentioned for the first time in the execution petition itself) and yet it was not argued in those cases that, in the absence of such a formal record, the certificate alone would not enable the Court to recognize the payment. This contention of Mr. Ramabhadra Aiyar therefore also fails.

Fourth contention: The certificates of plaintiffs 2 and 1, after they had released all their rights in the decree in favour respectively of plaintiffs 3 and 4, are useless. The releases (as I said before) are not translated or printed. Admittedly, they do not refer expressly to the decree amount due to the four partners as joint decree-holders. Oldfield, J., and myself held in Mahomed Silar Sahib & Co. v. Nabi Khan Sahib(2), following Bashyam Aiyangar J.'s statement of the law in Periasami v. Krishna Ayyan (5), that a payment out of Court to one only of several joint decree-holders cannot bind the others even if he and the others were partners. I think it follows on the same principle that certificates given by two joint decree-holders cannot also bind the other decree-holders even if all of them were partners. Hence I am inclined to hold that the certificates themselves given by plaintiffs 1 and 2 cannot be treated by the executing Court as having discharged the decree passed in favour of all the four plaintiffs, unless plaintiffs 3 and 4 had given authority (express or implied) to plaintiffs 1 and 2 to certify satisfaction. Turning to the releases given by plaintiffs 2 and 1, however I do not agree with the appellant's contention that those releases had the effect of vesting the entire rights in the decree in plaintiffs 3 and 4 alone. In the first place the decree had been discharged except in the eye of an executing Court. In the second place, plaintiffs 1 and 2 never intended to and never did transfer their interests in the decree (to the extent that they remained alive in the eye of the executing Court) in favour of plaintiffs 3 and 4 Hence, it must be taken that, notwithstanding the releases, the decree was alive in favour of all the four decree-holders so far as the executing Court was concerned.

The fifth and the last contention is that, in any event, plaintiffs 3 and 4 owned some fractional interest in the decree and that at least there was a transfer of that interest to the petitioner (appellant) and as the holder of such a fractional share in the decree, he could apply for execution of the whole decree on behalf of himself and of plaintiffs 1 and 2. I am inclined to hold in answer to this contention, that the transfer by plaintiffs 3 and 4 alone conveyed no title or interest in the decree debt in favour of the petitioner. In Mahomed Silar Sahib & Co. v. Nabi Khan Sahib (2) I observed as follows:

"I am very doubtful whether two out of three partners" (here it is two out of four partners) "can, in their individual capacities, legally claim definite shares in a particular decree debt belonging to themselves and the other partners jointly, such a decree debt being only an asset out of the numerous partnership assets. I think that they cannot make such a claim to own separate shares in a particular asset any more than a member of a joint Hindu family can claim to receive in his individual capacity (or give a valid discharge for) his share of a partner debt due by one of the debtors of the joint Hindu family which possesses numerous other assets. Neither a partner nor a member of a joint Hindu family can claim and receive a definite share in a particular partnership debt or family debt as the case may be."

It follows that as all the joint decree-holders did not join in the transfer, the petitioner got no interest even in a fraction of the decree amount. Further, under O. 21, R. 15, even if the petitioner by reason of the deed he obtained from plaintiffs 3 and 4 secured the status of a joint decree-holder with plaintiffs 1 and 2, he should have applied for the execution of the decree for the benefit of himself and plaintiffs 1 and 2 [see O. 21, R 15 (1)] whereas the application which he actually made was for his individual benefit alone. For the above reasons I hold that the dismissal of the petitioner's application for execution by the lower Courts ought to be upheld and this appeal shoul be dismissed with costs.

Napier, J.—The facts out of which this appeal arises are found by the lower appellate Court as follows: Plaintiffs 1 to 4 were partners and brought a suit against the defendants upon a promissory note. In the appellate Court the suit was settled by the payment of Rs. 485. This money was paid by one Muthia Thevan to the plaintiffs and credited in the partnership accounts. Subsequent to the payment, the plaintiffs dissolved the partnership defendants 3 and 4 taking over the assets and liabilities of the partnership and later on they assigned their interest to the petitioner without any consideration passing. The petitioner now seeks to execute the decree against the defendants who have discharged their liability. The Court having found that the amount was discharged and paid to all the plaintiffs, the claim has no merits, but it is argued that there has been no valid discharge within the meaning of O. 21, R. 2, Civil P. C., and that therefore the decree is still capable of execution. The proceedings taken under O. 21, R. 2, were as follows: The transferee decree-holder put in Execution Petition No. 407 of 1911 on 5th August 1911. Plaintiffs 1 and 2 put in separate counter petitions on 19th December 1911 and 6th December 1911 respectively. stating that a sum of Rs. 500 or Rs. 485 had been settled in full discharge of the decree debt and credited in the plaintiff's partnership accounts.

The District Munsif took proceedings to ascertain the truth of this statement, and partnership books were produced, but before further proceedings could be taken, plaintiff 1, and, then shortly afterwards, plaintiff 2 died. Notice was ordered to their representatives, but batta was not paid and the petition was dismissed. A subsequent petition was filed on 2nd October 1912 and withdrawn. Another petition, Execution Petition No. 4 of 1913, was filed on 20th November 1913, which is the petition out of which this appeal arises. The defendants rely on the counterpetitions by the deceased plaintiffs 1 and 2 as a bar to execution, while the petitioner contends that it is not a valid discharge. It is argued that there has been no certificate and no record within the meaning of O. 21, R. 2. Reliance is placed on a passage in the judgment of Bashyam Aiyangar, J., in a decision of the Full Bench reported as Periasami v. Krishna Ayyan (5). The question for decision was one of limitation, but in expressing his opinion the learned Judge says that a discharge not so recorded cannot be recognized by the Court executing the decree, for such record is by statute made indispensable evidence for proving the alleged discharge. At p. 440 however the learned Judge uses this language:

"If payment be made out of Court . . . such payment will, of course, be a sufficient discharge of the decree debt, and it is not the act of the Court in recording such payment as certified that operates as a discharge."

I do not think that the learned Judge meant to lay down that there must be a formal order of record. I think the real question is whether there has in fact been a discharge, and whether the fact of the discharge has been brought to the notice of the Court for the express purpose of staying further proceedings. That was clearly done in this case, for the two counterpetitions were put in reply to an application for execution by the transferee decree-holder, and it seems to me immaterial that the Court did not pass any order on the counter-petitions. There can be no doubt that if the District Munsif had been able to proceed with the application, he would have found, on the evidence as has now been found in these proceedings, that the money had been paid to the partnership, and he would have dismissed the petition on its merits. I am therefore of opinion that the counter-petitions were good certificates in form. This view receives some support from the language used by the learned Judges in Alathoor Badrudeen v. Gudam Mohideen (6), where they say that they might have been inclined to treat the judgment-debtor's counter-petition to an execution petition as an application to compel the judgment creditors to certify the adjustment, if that counter-petition had not been put in far too late. A still stronger case is that in Masilamani Mudaliar v. Sethuswami Aiyar (7), where the Bench was considering an acknowledgment for the purpose of saving limitation. There the form of certificate was a payment set out in Col. 5 of the execution petition showing payment on account. Ayling, J., says with reference to this:

"I see no reason why this should not be accepted as a certificate of payment under Cl. (1) of the rule, for nothing is prescribed in the rule as to the time within which or the manner in which the decree-holder must certify payment."

Kumaraswami Sastri, J., says following the decision in Rajam Aiyar v. Anantharatnam Aiyar (8):

"I do not think that the payments can be ignored as not certified if they were as a matter of fact made,"

(meaning of course thereby made and brought to the notice of the Court). These decisions seem to me to lay down what I conceive to be the true principle, namely that the object of the rule is not to require any particular form of proceeding, but only to provide that the Court should be informed of the payment. The next objection taken to the counter-petitions is that they were put in by plaintiffs 1 and 2 only after they had ceased to have any interest in the debt. It is contended therefore that there has been no certificate by the decree-holders, the argument being that the word "decree-holder" must mean all the decree-holders where there are more than one, and that the rule cannot be read as if it said "the decree-holder or any one of the several decree-holders." There is a great deal of force in this contention. I have however held that the object of the rule is to inform the Court, or putting it in the words of Bashyam Aiyangar, J.:

"It is not the act of the Court in recording such payment as certified that operates as a discharge."

The learned vakil for the appellant relies on the decision of a single Judge in Moti Ram v. Hannu Prasad (4). But in that case the joint decree-holder who had certified satisfaction did not certify it for the benefit of himself and the other decree-holders, and alleged only that he had received the amount of the decree. The decision of the learned Judge was based on the proposition that one of the two joint decree-holders cannot assume to himself power to give a discharge out of Court for the full amount of the decree. That is a proposition which cannot be disputed and is expressly laid down in Periasami v. Krishna Ayyan (5) and followed in a case reported as Mahomed Silar Sahib & Co. v. Nabi Khan Sahib (2). But here the amount has been paid to all the decree-holders though the certificate is only by two of them. The question is not one of substantive rights but of procedure. In a case reported as Tarruck Chunder Bhuttacharjee v. Divendro Nath Sanyal (9) one of the several joint decree-holders certified a payment to him of a 12-annas share in a decree and the other decree-holders applied for execution in full. The Court recognized the fact that in two earlier cases of Ranee Nyna Kooer v. Doolee Chund (10) and Brojeswari Chowdhranee v. Tripoora Soonderee Debi (11) the Court had held that where one of the decree-holders had certified payment of the whole decree, the remaining decree-holders ought not to be allowed to take out execution again until they had satisfied the Court that they knew nothing of the payment. The Court was however not prepared to go quite so far as that it decided that the Court ought not to recognize payment made out of Court if certified by only one decree-holder unless made and certified for the benefit of all. This view was based on the analogy of S. 231 of the old Code, which allowed one of several joint decree holders to apply for execution of the whole decree for the benefit of all. To my mind there is great force in this analogy and to allow one of several joint decree-holders who have already received payment to come in and apply for execution after the other decree-holders have certified discharge of the debt would, in my opinion, open the door to fraud and defeat the object of the section, which is not aimed at the prevention of payment out of Court but merely requires notice of it so as to prevent execution issuing. I can find no case in which such a certificate has been held to be bad where the amount has in fact been received by all the joint decree-holders. Therefore, in my opinion, this point also fails and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

SADASIVA AIYAR AND ODGERS, JJ.

Muthusawmi Asari In re—Prisoner—Appellant.

Criminal Appeal No. 115 of 1919, Decided on 28th July 1919, against order of Sess., Judge Ramnad, in Case No. 3 of 1919.

Penal Code (45 of 1860), Ss. 84 and 302—Evidence of insanity some time before occurrence but nothing to show that accused did not know consequence of his act—Conviction for murder is right—But reference is justified under Criminal P. C. (1908), S. 401.

The accused was charged with having stabbed his wife with a knife as a result of which she died. It was proved that sometime before the occurrence he was subject to insane fits, but there was no proof that when he committed the murder he did not know the nature or the consequences of his act. The accused was convicted and sentenced to transportation for life.

Held: that the conviction was right, but that the papers should be submitted to the Government under S. 401, Criminal P. C. for such action as it might think fit to take: 12 Mad. 459 and 23 Cal. 604, Foll. [P 129 C 1]

T. Rangaramanujachariar—for Appellant.

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The appellant has been convicted of murdering his wife by stabbing her in 2 or 3 places on her person. The two stabs given on the side of the abdomen brought on peritionitis and she died of the wounds 5 days after she was sent to the hospital. No motive for the offence has been established. The woman herself in her complaint, Ex. I, and in her statement (Ex. H to the Sub-Magistrate) stated that about 1½ years before the date of the occurrence, which was on 21st July 1918, her husband was insane, threw the domestic pots here and there and had his hands and legs chained for some mouths. She also stated that for about 4 days before the occurrence her husband was out of his senses, speaking to himself, weeping and abusing his wife and children. But it is not proved that his mind was so affected as to prevent him from knowing the nature and consequences of his acts and though he seems to have stabbed his wife in a fit of homicidal mania, I am unable to say that he is free from criminal responsibility for his act, having regard to the law as laid down by this Court in Queen Empress v. Venkatasami (1) and by the Calcutta High Court in Queen Empress v. Kader Nasyer Shah (2). I shall however, while following these cases and confirming the conviction and the sentence of transportation for life, direct (as directed by the learned Judges who decided those cases) that the proceedings be forwarded to His Excellency the Governor in Council for any action which His Excellency may think fit to take under the powers given to the Local Government by S. 401, Criminal P. C.

Odgers, J.—I agree. It is impossible in face of the medical evidence to say that the accused falls within the purview of S. 84, I P. C. The evidence is that the doctor had the accused under his observation for about a week in August 1918 and was unable to say that the accused showed any signs of insanity whatever. He admitted however that he was also unable to say what the state of the accused's mind might have been in July 1918 when the crime was committed. It is also, in my opinion, a fact to be borne in mind that the accused was in hiding for 20 or 25 days after the commission of the offence.

I agree with my learned brother that the facts of this case are governed by the cases in Queen Empress v. Venkatasami (1) and Queen Empress v. Kadar Naseer Shah (2) which he has referred to, and I concur in the order proposed by him.

Second Appeal No. 1567 of 1917, Decided on 9th January 1919, against the decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Tellicherry, in Appeal Suit No. 621 of 1916.

Mortgage — Redemption — Time-barred mortgages need not be redeemed along with those not barred.

Where a person has executed several mortgages in favour of one party, some of which are barred, he can sue for redemption of such of the mortgage deeds only as are not barred, and is under no obligation to redeem those which are time barred. 43 I. C. 285 and (1918) M. W. N. 75, Foll. [P 130 C 2]

C. Madhavan Nair—for Appellants.

C. Kunhi Raman—for Respondents.

Order.—The appellants have no case against respondent 5 on the findings of fact. Defendants 1 and 2 contended that the plaintiffs must redeem the mortgages evidenced by Exs. 1 and 2 simultaneously with the mortgage under Ex. B. Before we decide this point of law, we think it desirable to call for a finding on the following issue:

"Whether the mortgages under Exs. 1 and 2 were real and valid, and if so, whether they were time barred or not on the date of plaintiffs' suit."

As this will depend on whether there is any evidence that these rights were really created and were kept alive by acknowledgment or otherwise, either party will be allowed to adduce fresh evidence on both points. The finding should be submitted within two months from the date of the receipt of this order and ten days will be allowed for filing objections after the notice of the receipt of the same has been posted up in this Court. In compliance with the above order the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Tellicherry submitted the following

Finding.—I have been ordered to submit a finding on the following issue, namely: Whether the mortgages under Exs. 1 and 2 were real and valid and if so, whether they were time-barred or not on the date of plaintiffs' suit? (2) In Original Suit No. 456 of 1889, these two debts were held to be not binding on the tarwad. It was so held, as the mortgaged property was found to be property belonging to the tarwad and Kanhoonham Amma, who held the property as a provision for her maintenance, had no right to create charges on the property (vide Ex. 3). But in that case Raman Nambiar, one of the executants of these two documents, when examined in that case, admitted receipt of consideration (vide Ex. 4.) So it should be held that the bonds are genuine and that they are supported by consideration. In 1900 this property was found to be the separate property of Kunhoonham Amma and the decree in Original Suit No. 456 of 1889 to be one obtained by collusion (vide Ex. D). In 1910 on a melcharth obtained from the tarwad a suit was instituted to recover this property. There also it was found that the property did not belong to the tarwad (vide Ex. E). The property should therefore be held to be property which belonged exclusively to Kunhconham Amma. Kunhoonham Amma is one of the executants of Exs. 1 and 2. Under the circumstances I should hold that the mortgages under Exs. 1 and 2 were real and valid.

The next question is whether these debts were time barred or not on the date of this suit. Kunhoonham Amma leased this property in 1052 (1877) to Raman on a rent of Rs. 6 a year (vide para. 6 of the plaint). In 1053 (1877) Raman was empowered to appropriate this rent of Rs. 6 towards the interest due to him for the sum of Rs. 50 lent by him under Ex. B. Ex. 1 is a mortgage deed for Rs. 70 executed on 22nd Kumbhom 1056 (22nd sic February 1881). The interest fixed in it is 18 per cent. per annum. The time fixed for payment is one year. Ex. 2 is for Rs. 35. It is a document executed on 17th Vrichigam 1063 (1st December 1887). The interest fixed in it is 18 per cent. per annum. The time fixed for payment in it expired on 15th August 1888. On default of payment on the due date there is provision in it, that the amount due then with further interest at 24 per cent. per annum should be a charge on the plaint property. There is Raman's admission of these debts on 3rd October 1890 vide Ex. 4. After the case was sent back for finding, parties have not produced any new document. The only witness examined is defendant 1. He states that the agreement was to return the sum due under Ex. 2 along with the sum due under Ex. B. This agreement does not find a place in Ex. 2. On the evidence on record I should find that the claims under Exs. 1 and 2 were time barred on the date of the institution of this suit. My finding therefore is that the mortgages under Exs. 1 and 2 were real and valid and that they were time-barred on the date of the plaintiffs' suit.

This second appeal coming on for final hearing, after the return of the finding of the lower appellate Court on the issue referred by this Court for trial, the Court delivered the following

Judgment.—We accept the findings. Following Ramakrishna Kukkilaya v. Nekkar Kuppanna (1), we consider that plaintiffs were under no obligation to redeem the time barred hypothecation deeds. The second appeal is dismissed with costs. Time for redemption is extended for three months.

S. T. Srinivasagopala Chariar—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The defendant is the appellant. He obtained a permanent lease of a house site from the trustee of a religious trust in 1911. The successor in the trusteeship brought this suit in 1915 to eject him. That the permanent lease is invalid against the trust cannot be denied and though the second ground in the appeal memorandum contends that it is valid against the trust, the point was not seriously argued: see Palaniappa Chetty v. Sreemath Deivasikamony Pandara Sannadhi (1). The next contention was that defendant who has built a house on the leased site, is entitled to compensation before his evictment and is not merely entitled to be allowed to remove the materials of the house (which he has been allowed to do by the decrees of the lower Courts). Mr. T. V. Venkatarama Aiyar conceded that he cannot rely on S. 51, Act 4 of 1882, (T. P. Act), in support of his claim to compensation: see on this point our judgment in Perumal Gramani v. Mahamad Kasim Sahib (2). He however relied on S. 2, Act 11 of 1855 (Mesne Profits and Improvements Act). That Act applies only to cases tried on the original side of the High Courts to which English law applies and, even in such cases, we are not, as at present advised, prepared to agree with certain obiter dicta quoted by Mr. T. V. Venkatarama Aiyar that the words "other absolute estate" in S. 2, Act 11 of 1855 include the estate of a lessee with permanent occupancy rights.

Lastly it was contended that the plaint does not allege that the tenancy from year to year created by payment of rent [see Municipal Corporation of Bombay v. Secretary of State (3)], had been put an end to by a proper notice to quit and that therefore the suit should be dismissed as not disclosing a complete cause of action in ejectment. It may be conceded that though this point was not taken in the lower Courts, this Court, even in second appeal, can allow the point to be taken and argued and can decide the case on that point: see Subba v. Nagappa (4) and Abdulla Rawutan v. Subbarayyar (5). But we do not think we are bound to consider it and to decide this second appeal on a point not taken in the lower Courts. In Subba v. Nagappa (4) the tenant had been in possession from 1869 and the case was finally decided against the tenant on the finding submitted after remand that reasonable notice had been given. In Abdulla Rawutan v. Subbarayyar (5) also the tenants had long been in possession, and though the suit was remanded for a finding the ultimate result of the cases is not known. We do not think that these cases decide that we are bound in second appeal to consider a ground of defence not taken in the lower Courts, unless perhaps it is a question of limitation arising out of proved or admitted facts. O. 41, R. 2, Civil P. C., says:

"The appellant shall not, except by leave of the Court, urge or be heard in support of any ground of objection not set forth in the memorandum of appeal, but the appellate Court . . . shall not be confined to the grounds set forth, etc."

Now no ground of objection was set forth in the appeal memorandum presented to the lower appellate Court on the question of want of notice and it was not argued there. The lower appellate Court therefore was not bound to take the point itself and its decision on the grounds argued before it is correct. The defendant in this case obtained his lease only four or five years before this suit was brought and though we are entitled to consider the question of want of notice and to remand the suit for getting findings on the facts relating to that question after, if necessary, allowing plaintiff to amend his plaint, we do not think we are bound in second appeal to do more than decide whether the lower appellate Court's decision was wrong in having been contrary to law, etc., or failed to determine an issue of law, etc., or vitiated by substantial error or defect in procedure (S. 100, Civil P. C.). If the lower appellate Court was not bound to take notice of a question not raised in the appeal memorandum presented to it, it cannot be said that its decision was vitiated by any errors in procedure or defect in determination of points which it was bound to have considered.

We do not think that, on the facts found in this case, our discretion should be exercised in favour of the question of want of notice being allowed to be raised and argued before us. In the result the second appeal is dismissed with costs. Three months' time from this day is allowed to the appellant for the removal of the superstructure.

ABDUR RAHIM AND OLDFIELD, JJ.

M. S. Yesuvadiyan—Defendant—Appellant.

v.

P. S. A. Subba Naicker — Plaintiff—Respondent.

Civil Appeal No. 98 of 1917, Decided on 1st November 1918, against decree of Sub-Judge, Tuticorin, in Civil Suit No. 6 of 1916.

(a) Evidence Act (1872), S. 34—Account book entries must be shown to be real and honest transactions—They must be corroborated—No form of evidence can be prescribed.

Section 34, Evidence Act only lays dows that a plaintiff cannot obtain a decree by merely proving the existence of certain entries in his books of account, even though those books are shown to be kept in the regular course of business. He will have to show further by some independent evidence that the entries represent real and honest transactions and that the moneys were paid in accordance with those entries. No particular form or kind of evidence in addition to the entries is required. Any relevant facts which can be treated as evidence within the meaning of the Evidence Act would be sufficient corroboration of the evidence furnished in books of account if true. [P 136 C 1]

(b) Evidence Act (1872), S. 160—"Sure" explained—It must be shown that the witness is justified in being sure that the record relied on by him is correct.

The expression "sure" in S. 160 in the sentence "if he is sure that the facts were correctly recorded in the statement" does not mean that the degree of conviction postulated by it can be treated as equivalent to any on which the witness may choose to say that he is sure, whether or not it is too fantastic or illogical to commend itself to reasonable men. The meaning of the expression is that the witness must satisfy the Court, with reference to ordinary probabilities, of his right to be sure that the record relied on by him is correct. [P 138 C 2]

Abdur Rahim, J.—The appeal arises in a suit to recover sums of money amounting to Rs. 8,000 from the defendant on the basis of certain dealings. The plaintiff is a dealer in cotton and had been doing businesses with Messrs. Gaddam & Co. and afterwards with the New Berar Company, supplying them with cotton. The defendant was at first a writer employed in Gaddam & Co.'s office and afterwards did business as a broker Admittedly the defendant had dealings with the plaintiff ; he used to pay moneys to the plaintiff by way of deposit and drew moneys from time to time. The dealings out of which this suit has arisen covered a period of five or six years, and the claim of the plaintiff is that, on taking accounts, he was entitled to the sum which he has claimed. The defendant's case, on the other hand is that he was entitled to Rs. 7,000 odd and not that he owed anything to the plaintiff The mode of dealings between the parties was of an extremely lax character. The defendant paying in sums of money from time to time never asked for any reciept or voucher for them. According to the case of the plaintiff the defendant drew sums of money during the last five or six years on different dates ; on some occasions he sent round chits to the plaintiff on which payments were made, but on the majority of occasions, payments were made on the defendant's personal equest, there being no chits from the defendant authorising those payments. The learned Subordinate Judge has given a decree to the plaintiff as asked for in the plaint. The evidence in the case consists mainly of entries in the plaintiff's books of account. The defendant has not produced any accounts whatever, and the suggestion of the plaintiff is that he has accounts but has wilfully withheld them. The defendant denies that he has accounts but, he says, with reference to about 29 or 30 out of about 200 items, that he did draw those sums and that he recollected having done so, although he has no accounts or other records with which he could refresh his memory. The accounts filed by the plaintiff have been impeached by the defendant as fabrications. The accounts consist of ledgers and day-books. They are properly bound books and from outward appearance the books seem to be regularly kept. The parties fell out sometime in December 1915. Before that, admittedly, they were good friends and there cannot be the slightest doubt that they trusted each other. The case of the defence, if true, would mean that these accounts-books, covering a period of six years and containing accounts of the dealings not only of the defendant but of various other persons, have all been fabricated.

It would also mean, on the admitted facts of the case, that if they were fabricated it was done after the parties fell out, that is, after December 1915. Without saying that it is impossible, I should regard it as extremely improbable, that books such as we have before us have been paged, especially, without any sort of internal evidence whatever in the books themselves to bear out the defendant's suggestion that they have been concocted for the purpose of this case. No attempt was, in fact, made in the Court of trial, nor was any serious attempt made before me by Mr. T. Rangachariar who opened the case of the defendant (appellant) to show, from the character of the books or the entries, that the entries were either interpolated or that pages had been removed and new pages containing fresh entries had been substituted. There are, on the other hand, circumstances which would show that there is no substantial reason for doubting the garnishees and the bona fides of these books of account. They had been filed previously in connexion with other suits in other Courts. And the nature of the entries relating to the dealings between the plaintiff and the defendant would in itself make it extremely difficult for the plaintiff to get up false entries to support his case. There are only two entries with respect to which any attempt has been made by the defendant to contradict the plaintiff's books. I shall deal with them later and point out that no good arguments can be based on these two items. It has to be pointed out that the case was not satisfactorily conducted for either party in the lower Court, and the procedure adopted for proving the entries was not strictly in accordance with what the law required. The plaintiff's evidence is that he made all these payments with which the defendant is charged ; whether he made payments with his own hand or through clerks or writers who made payments on his orders would not make any difference. He apparently attended to his business himself. He used to be present at the shop, except when he was away to some other place of business and plaintiff knew the way in which entries used to be made in the books of account by the different writers and accountants. In his examination-in-chief, in addition to general statement that all the payments were made as entered and that he made the payments himself, he speaks to a large number of specific items of which he has personal recollection independently of the entries in the books ; most of those items are of large amounts and he deals with them in detail in his examination-in-chief.

While he was cross-examined with reference to these specific items, it does not appear that any attempt was made by the pleader for the defendant to make out that as regards other items he could have had no personal knowledge or means of speaking to them in the way he did in his examination-in-chief. No doubt it would have been more in accordance with the proper practice for the pleader for the plaintiff having asked him specifically about the items of which he had independent recollection, to have questioned him about the other items, which he said were actually paid to the defendant, but with reference to which he had no independent recollection allowing him to refresh his memory with the entries in the books according to the provisions of Ss. 159 and 160, Evidence Act. But no objection was apparently taken to the form of the question or the answer with reference to these latter items. We may take it, therefore that the plaintiff purported to speak not only to the specific items mentioned by him, but also to the other payments entered in the book as having been made within his knowledge. We have also the evidence of two of the writers of the books and in their case we find that they were asked to speak to the way in which the books were kept and not to the items specifically. I should have been disposed to take a more serious view of this mode of proving the entries, but for the fact that the defendant's pleader made no objection Further, the plaintiff has with the plaint filed a list of the items with respect to which the defendant is charged that list being simply a copy of the entries in the books of account, so that the defendant has ample notice of the items to which the plaintiff and his witnesses must have been referring as relating to the defendant's transactions in Exs. A and B series.

Then we have a number of items which has been clearly proved by evidence other than the entries by means of vouchers or chits, in addition to the oral testimony of the plaintiff. On the other hand, it is difficult to accept the defendant's statement that he kept no accounts whatever. He is a broker and had dealings not only with the plaintiff but with other persons, and it is unlikely that he did not keep any accounts or any records of the transactions into which he entered as broker or of his other dealings His case strikes me as somewhat extraordinary. He professes to remember 29 or 30 items extending over a number of years and ignores all the other transactions alleged by the plaintiff. All that he appears to have done was to pick out certain items which he felt could not possibly be resisted and about which no decent show of objection could be advanced by him and admitted them, not because he had any recollection whatever of these items. His case is that he never drew money, except on chits. On this point the evidence is absolutely clear to my mind that he used to ask the plaintiff to make payments on his account or get money from him himself without any sort of voucher whatever. There are several instances of that sort proved by evidence independently of the entries. The nature of his drawings would also suggest that he could not have been sending chits for every payment. We find for instance, entries relating to small amounts like Rs. 2, Rs. 3 and Rs. 5, and there are entries to show that payments were made through himself or through other persons some of whom were apparently peons employed in the office of Gaddam & Co. If there were chits in connexion with those payments then the entries relating to them would not have appeared in the form in which they are made. The entries mention the names of persons through whom payments were made at the instance of and on behalf of the defendant.

If the defence of the defendant was true he could easily have called those persons and shown that the entries were false. He has made no such attempt except in the two cases above mentioned but which I shall show do not bear out the suggestion of the defendant. It was strongly pressed upon us by Mt. T. Rangachariar that the plaintiff ought to have asked for some voucher whenever he made payments, or that he ought to have taken the signature of the defendant whenever payments were made to him. And it was pointed out to us that the plaintiff did keep books for taking signatures of persons. As regards these books the evidence is not at all clear as to the nature of the transactions with respect to which the signature of parties used to be taken. That the plaintiff and the defendant, until they fell out, reposed confidence in each other is abundantly clear. As already mentioned, the defendant does not declare that he obtained any receipts or vouchers for the amounts paid in by him from time to time. He must have trusted not only the plaintiff but must have relied upon the mode in which the plaintiff kept his books of account and did business. And if the defendant trusted the plaintiff in that way, it does not surprise me in the least that the plaintiff should have made payments without insisting on vouchers on each occasion. I may here mention some of the larger items which must be taken to be proved by evidence independently of the entries, for instance the item of Rs. 1,391-8-2. The case of the plaintiffs is that he borrowed from the office of Messrs. Gaddam & Co. Rs. 1,500, and out of that amount gave this sum to the defendant. It was suggested by Mr. T. Rangachariar that it is a false story that he borrowed any money from Messrs. Gaddam & Co. If there was any foundation for this suggestion nothing was easier for the defendant than to produce the books of his employees and to prove the falsity of the plaintiff's case.

As regards the transaction relating to mortgage Ex. E with respect to which a sum of Rs. 496 was paid by the plaintiff, the case of the defendant is that it was paid not to him but to his brother. This payment is supported by the receipt Ex. D-1, the payments being made at the shop of one Ambalavana Pillai, and P. W. 5 proves the handwriting of this man in Ex. D. If the payment was not made at the instance of the defendant, and it was a dealing directly between the plaintiff and the plaintiff's brother, one would have expected the defendant to examine his brother and prove the falsity of the plaintiff's case. No such attempt has however been made. I might refer to the transaction evidenced by Ex. A as showing that it is unlikely that the plaintiff owed large sums of money to the defendant in 1915 or thereabouts as related by him. The defendant obtained from the plaintiff assignment of an othi for Rs. 4,000 and he paid down Rs. 1,000 and agreed to pay the balance of Rs 3,000 before the Sub-Registrar. As he failed to pay the balance, the transaction fell through and the plaintiff had to refund Rs. 1,000 to the defendant. If the defendant's case were true it was not likely that he would pay Rs. 1,000 if as a matter of fact Rs. 6,000 or Rs. 7,000, were owing to the plaintiff. I shall deal now with some of the criticisms made on behalf of the defendant as to the corrections of certain entries. Under the transaction which is represented by Ex. C 5 that is a chit on which, according to the case of the plaintiff, certain payments were made, Rs. 100 was to be paid to some person not mentioned therein.

The suggestion' on behalf of the defendant that Ex. C-5, which he alleges has been wrongly translated, means that the payment was to be made on behalf of the defendant to the plaintiff himself, is not borne out. If that were the correct interpretation, then one would have expected that the man who was to pay the money to the plaintiff would be mentioned. Taking the document as it stands, the criticism on behalf of the defendant is that the entry on 10th June 1913 is not of Rs. 100 but of Rs. 80. There is also a further entry of Rs. 25; that would make up Rs. 105 and not Rs 100. There is to that extent discrepancy between Ex. C-5 and the entry in plaintiff's book. But I am not satisfied that the discrepancy could not have been explained if the plaintiff or any of the accountants who had knowledge of the matter was asked about it. But the defendant's strongest criticism is with reference to the entries dated 3rd April and 17th April 1914. The first one reads: "Debit. taken and paid by S. A. for P K. S. Rs. 25," and the latter is to the effect: "Debit for P. R. M. S. Rs. 373-12 4."

The defendant has examined D. Ws 3 and 4 who are employed in the P. K. S. A. A. firm and P. R. M. S. firm respectively, who prove that on the dates mentioned there are no entries in the plaintiff's book. But these two witnesses were examined after the plaintiff had closed the case, and neither the plaintiff's nor any of his witnesses' attention had been specifically drawn to nor were they asked any questions as to the nature of these transactions that might not in itself be a sufficient answer, if the entries themselves were quite clear and unambiguous which we do not think they are. Both these entries are worded differently from other entries in cases where payments were made to a particular person or firm at the instance of the defendant. This entry of the 3rd April is that Rs. 25 was paid by the plaintiff "for" P. K. S. and similarly the entry of the 17th is that Rs. 373-12-4 was debited "for" P. R. M. S. As Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar, the learned vakil for the respondent, suggested it might be that money was taken for payment to the said two firms by the defendant himself or some one on his behalf and not actually paid on those dates or not paid at all. In the absence of any question put to the plaintiff or the witnesses asking them to explain these transactions, I do not think it would be fair to accept the evidence of D. Ws. 3 and 4 showing that the entries in question in the plaintiff's books are false. I am satisfied on considering the evidence as a whole, in spite of the irregular way in which the case of the parties was conducted in the lower Court and the unsatisfactory manner of proving the entries in the books of account which were not specifically put to the plaintiff or his witnesses, that the accounts were duly kept in the regular course of business and that the entries represent true and honest transactions. Further as regards certain items, there is corroborative evidence in the shape of vouchers; and the circumstances of the case to which I have alluded also show that the items mentioned in the entries in question are true and genuine and represent a real transaction.

But it is argued on behalf of the appellant, that the evidence as it stands is not sufficient in law to found a decree on against the defendant. S. 34, Evidence Act, lays down that the entries in books of account, regularly kept in the course of business are relevant, but such a statement will not alone be sufficient to charge any person with liability. That merely means that the plaintiff cannot obtain a decree by merely proving the existence of certain entries in his books of account even though those books are shown to be kept in the regular course of business. He will have to show further by some independent evidence that the entries represent real and honest transactions and that the moneys were paid in accordance with those entries. The legislature however does not require any particular form or kind of evidence in addition to entries in books of account, and I take it that any relevant facts which can be treated as evidence within the meaning of the Evidence Act would be sufficient corroboration of the evidence furnished by entries in books of account if true. I have already pointed out that with reference to certain specific items, there is ample corroborative evidence, and I have also mentioned the circumstances which would go to show that the transactions represented by these entries are true and honest. I am inclined to think that, apart from the oral statement there is sufficient corroboration of the entries in this case. Then I do not find that sufficient reason has been shown for not accepting the statement of the plaintiff in his examination-in-chief, that all the items in the accounts were really given to the defendant meaning that all the payments as entered were actually made to the defendant. This is not a mere isolated statement. In the very beginning of the examination-in-chief he says:

"The defendant used to take money without giving chits. If the defendant had personally asked me to pay the money to anybody, I used to pay without taking the signature of the person who takes the money. When I paid money to defendant directly, I never took his signature or got any voucher. The defendant has not made any payment over and above what I have entered in the accounts."

His case was according to his evidence that it was he who used to make the payments. This does not necessarily mean that he used with his own hands always to hand over money to the defendant or his messenger, but only that the payments were made under his personal supervision or direction. That is the case he sought to make out. It might be that if the defendant had made an attempt he might have been able to show by cross-examination that this was an improbable statement and should not be accepted, but I do not find that he really made any such attempt. It is possible that the plaintiff did not have any direct recollection of all the items. He had independent recollection of some items, and as regards others he might have remembered them on looking into the accounts. This is suggested by a statement made by the plaintiff in his cross-examination. He says with reference to certain entries: "These I remember independently even without looking into accounts." As regards the items which he did not remember in that way I do not find that the cross-examination was directed to show that it was improbable or unlikely, having regard to the lapse of time, or the course of business adopted by the plaintiff, or that he could not be relied upon to remember those items even on reference to the entries.

It is quite true as pointed out by the learned pleader for the respondent, that so far as it appears on the record, the plaintiff did not in so many words say that, as regards the items of which he had no independent recollection, he was sure that they were true items on examining the entries which were made and of which he had knowledge at the time or soon afterwards. That would have been the correct way of examining the plaintiff on this point, but the pleader who conducted the case for the defence neither raised any objection to his making a general categorical statement that all the items in the accounts were really given to the defendant as entered in the accounts, nor did he attempt by cross-examination to show that these general statements could not be accepted. Having regard to the way in which the plaintiff was cross-examined, I am unable to say that the statement as regards the entries in the books of account generally should be rejected on grounds of improbability, especially as I have not the slightest hesitation in holding that the accounts of the plaintiff are genuine and bona fide and that the admitted facts and circumstances point to the truth of the plaintiff's case and the falsity of the defendant's case.

I do not propose to go into all the cases cited at the Bar with reference to S. 34, Evidence Act. There is no difficulty in ascertaining what the enactment means, but the difficulty lies in applying it to the facts of a particular case. Much reliance was placed on behalf of the appellant on the ruling of the Privy Council reported as Baboo Gunga Persad v. Baboo Inderjit Singh (1). But, apart from the facts of that case, all that their Lordships laid down was that an entry in the books of account regularly kept in the course of business is merely corroborative evidence. To the same effect is the ruling reported as Queen v. Hurdeep Sahoy (2). I might here point out that the present Evidence Act does not say that an entry is merely corroborative evidence, it is substantive evidence, though by itself not sufficient to charge a person with liability. I do not find that the cases reported as Sorab Jee Vacha Ganda v. Koonwur Jee Manik-Jee (3) and Hingu Miya v. Heramba Chandra Chakravarti (4) help the appellant any further. With reference to the latter, emphasis is laid on the fact that the learned Judges then say that each particular entry must be proved. No doubt that is the correct proceeding. But as I have already pointed out, it is merely a matter of mode of proof and, as the defendant raised no objection to the way in which the entries were proved in the lower Court, I do not think anything turns upon this point. We hope however that in future when entries in books of account are sought to be proved, strict attention should be paid to the method of proving them as pointed out in Hingu Miya v. Heramba Chandra Chakravarti (4), and further that the entries themselves ought to be marked as exhibits and not the books.

In Jaswant Singh v. Sheo Narain Lal (5) we find that their Lordships discuss at length not only the genuineness of the entries in the books of account, but also the character of the entries themselves as to whether they represented a real transaction with reference to certain items which were proved by evidence independently of the entries, and rely upon the general circumstances of the case showing that the accounts were bona fide and true. They observe:

"There Lordships need not go through other items in the books nor deal with the evidence showing that the defendant had bill transactions with other people The cases they have examined are sufficient, in the entire absence of countervailing evidence, to establish three propositions. They prove that the defendant's sweeping denials of his connexion with bill transactions are not true, and thereby they materially shake his credit. They prove that he drew hundis on Gobind Dass and sold them to the plaintiff, thereby displacing the defendant's flat denials of dealings with the plaintiff, and meeting the improbability that he should have drawn upon a house unknown to him, by proof of the fact that he did so. They lead to the belief that the plaintiff's books are authentic and honest, and his gumasta's evidence true, so that the course of the dealing alleged by the plaintiff terminating in the six hundis now sued on is supported."

Here also enough has been proved to show that the defendant's denial that he ever drew money except on chits is untrue and the course of dealings between the plaintiff and the defendant showed that the transactions took place as evidenced by the entries. I may also here refer to the decision in Dwarka Das v. Sant Bakhsh (6). With reference to the value to be attached to the plaintiff's general statement that the items mentioned in the entries were paid to the defendant, the learned Judges point out that it was the duty of the defendant to challenge the statement, to cross-examine with reference to it and show that it could not be believed. I am therefore satisfied that the judgment of the Subordinate Judge is right and must be upheld. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Oldfield, J.—I concur generally with my learned brother and I therefore do not think it necessary to follow him in his detailed statement of the evidence. But I desire to say a few words regarding the cases in which it was alleged that there was no corroboration for the various items of the plaintiff's claim except the accounts and regarding which the question arose whether other evidence was in fact given. If no other evidence besides the accounts were given, however strongly those accounts may be supported by the probabilities, and however strong may be the evidence as to the honesty of those who kept them, such consideration could not alone with reference to S. 34, Evidence Act, be the basis of a decree. In Jaswat Singh v. Sheo Narayan Lal (5) the Judicial Committee no doubt gave a decree after testing the entries in the accounts before it with reference to the correspondence regarding certain entries in those accounts and other independent evidence regarding them. But I do not think that that decision is in any way inconsistent with the general pro position enunciated regarding S. 34.

In that case there was in fact some direct evidence as to the making of the hundis which were in question and their Lordships, no doubt, said that the direct evidence was quite untrustworthy. They must presumably have meant that notwithstanding its intrinsically untrustworthy character they were prepared to act on it in view of the other circumstances of the case and the direct evidence as to particular items. The question is whether the evidence of the plaintiff can be accepted and taken as a basis for the decree supplemented as it is by the evidence of the accounts. The defendant contends that the plaintiff's evidence, if rightly construed, was not direct evidence at all and what he said really amounted only to inference from the account entries, and that he should not be understood as saying that he himself had any knowledge of the payments whatever independently of the presumptions which he was drawing from the entries in the accounts regarding them. The plaintiff's evidence in chief consisted first in a statement "when I paid money to defendant directly, I never took his signature or got any voucher." There were then various particular references to particular payments, which he prefaced with the words "I paid." Lastly there was the statement: "All the itmes in the account were really given to defendant and entered in the accounts." Those are his statements in chief. If the defendant's were the proper interpretation of plaintiff's evidence, I should certainly hold that it did not afford the corroboration which the law requires. No doubt, S. 160, Evidence Act, says:

> "The witness may also testify to facts in any such document as is mentioned in S. 159, although he has no specific recollection of the facts themselves, if he is sure that the facts were correctly recorded in the document," and it was suggested that in any case the plaintiff, on the one hand, must be presumed to have correctly recorded the facts in his accounts, although on the other he did not say so explicitly. As regards the section, I may observe first that the use of the word "sure" is, I believe, unique in the Evidence Act. It does not seem to me that the degree of conviction postulated by the use of that word can be treated as equivalent to any, on which the witness may choose to say that he is sure, whether or not it is too fantastic or illogical to commend itself to reasonable men. The meaning must be, I think, that the witness satisfies the Court with reference to ordinary probabilities of his right to be sure that the record relied on by him is correct. Then again there is the reference to S. 159, which provides that the witness may refer to "any such writing made by any other person and read by the witness within the time aforesaid", if, when he read it, he knew it to be correct, the time aforesaid being the time within which the Court would consider it likely that the transaction was fresh in his memory. Now if the case were only that the plaintiff must be supposed to have been speaking with reference to the accounts, it would be material that he said nothing definite as to his having looked into the accounts within the time above referred to or as to his reasons for being sure that they were a correct record. But that is not what the plaintiff said, and it is a very material point that there was no suggestion resembling that now made by the defendant in cross-examination. The defendant in fact made no objection to the plaintiff making the statements he did both generally and in detail. There were no doubt some questions put to the plaintiff with reference to his residence as to which he admitted that he stayed in Tuticorin and also in other villages 16 miles distant and that the suit transactions took place in Tuticorin. He said also that his agents transacted business in his absence. But he said nothing at that point regarding the particular payments which are in dispute. He said only: "I was present when I made those payments to the defendant." We have been referred to a number of payments which are the subject-matter of the appeal and there is no reason for adopting any such unnatural interpretation of the evidence. There was nothing further in the plaintiff's cross-examination or in the cross examination of one of his accountants, P. W. 2. P. W. 3, another accountant, was no doubt asked a question, in reply to which he said:

"I must refer to the account to say whether all payments were made by me or by plaintiff. I cannot say anything from memory."

But there was no suggesting as regards the payments, if any, which were not made by him, the plaintiff having been present. In these circumstances it does not seem to me that there is any question of reliance by the plaintiff on S. 160. The plaintiff's evidence, as I understand it, was simply that he made the payments himself. There is nothing in the case regarding the plaintiff's course of business which enables me to form any opinion as to the probability of all his statements. It is not for us to speculate as to what stringent cross examination might have disclosed. The circumstances of the case in fact resemble those reported as Dwarka Das v. Sant Bakhsh (6). To adopt the language used there, the plaintiff's evidence should receive the favourable construction which would entitle us to treat it as substantive evidence in this case and not to conclude it as evidence which was inadmissible.

So treating it, we have a foundation, on which the decree in favour of the plaintiff can be passed, supplemented by the entries in the accounts. I agree that he is entitled to a decree as regards the items in connexion with which it was contended that no direct evidence was available. I agree with the decree proposed by my learned brother.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 377 of 1918, Decided on 7th March 1919, to revise decree of Dist. Munsif, Chowghat, in Sm. C. S. No. 607 of 1917.

Contract Act (9 of 1872), S. 30—Wagering contract—"Kuri"—Suit to recover money paid towards "kuri" is not enforceable.

Though a "kuri", as ordinarily conducted in Malabar is not a lottery, yet if some subscribers obtain as prizes amounts which are in excess of the amounts subscribed by them, it comes within the definition of lottery and a suit to recover money paid for such lottery is not enforceable.

C. Madhavan Nair—for Petitioner.

Judgment. — It has been held in Kamakshi Achari v. Appavu Pillai (1) that a "kuri" as ordinarily conducted is not lottery, inasmuch as each subscriber merely gets back his subscriptions in the form of a loan, and the only thing which is dependent on chance is the order in which the loans are received. In the present case however one subscriber at each of the first 99 drawings received something more than what he subscribed the amounts varying from four annas to Rs. 24-12-0. No doubt all the other subscribers eventually got back their money without interest but that does not affect the case of those subscribers who got prizes in excess of their subscriptions.

The fact that the promoter of the kuri was liable to the remaining subscribers for the future subscriptions of the prize winners does not alter the nature of the business, for the prize-winners themselves were under no such liability. Although therefore it has been consistently held in this Court that a kuri as ordinarily conducted does not amount to a lottery, the present form of kuri appears to me to come within the definition of lottery (i. e.,) a distribution of prizes by lot, or chances, and I may refer to the English cases on the point [Taylor v. Smetten (2), Reg v. Harris (3) and Willis v. Young (4)]. The prizes may by actuarial calculation be found to be approximately equivalent to the interest that might have been earned by the prize-winner in the ordinary form of kuri, but in the present case he is absolved from all risks attendant on earning such interest but gets his prize in ready cash. I therefore hold that the plaint kuri is a lottery in which some subscribers obtain prizes by lot and consequently plaintiff's suit to recover money paid for such lottery is not maintainable. The petition is allowed and plaintiff's suit dismissed with costs throughout.

WALLIS, C. J. AND SPENCER, J.

Haridoss Banmali Doss—Respondent.

Original Side Appeal No 63 of 1916, Decided on 22nd February 1918, from judgment of Kumaraswami Sastri, J. D/. 8th September 1916.

(a) Contract Act (1872), Ss. 151 and 152—Railway company's responsibility for misdelivery of goods and animals is similar to that of bailee—Railways Act, S 72.

The measure of responsibility of a railway company as a carrier of animals or goods is that of a bailee under the Contract Act. The chapter relating to bailments in the Contract Act covers the whole liability of the railway company including, among other things, their responsibility for misdelivery by whatever reason caused. [P 141 C 2]

(b) Railways Act (1890), S. 77--Railway causing wilful misdelivery—Suit without prior notice is not maintainable — In requiring notice no distinction is to be made between cases in which goods are inadvertently delivered to wrong person and cases in which they are delivered to person other than consignee who did not produce receipt.

A suit for damages against a railway company caused by wilful misdelivery of the goods is not maintainable without a prior notice of the claim under S. 77.

In the matter of requiring notice no distinction should be drawn between cases in which goods have been delivered inadvertently to the wrong person and cases in which they were delivered to a person other than the consignee who claimed to be entitled to them but did not not produce the railway receipt as he should have done, in support of his claim. [P 142 C 1]

 (c) Railways Act (1890), S. 72—Company is under no duty to get back railway receipts on delivery of goods—Goods delivered to person entitled to them without production of receipt—Subsequent endorsement will not give endorsee of receipt cause of action against company even though person taking delivery becomes entitled to them only after delivery but before endorsement.

A railway company is under no obligation to deliver goods consigned to the consignee or any person entitled to it only on production of the railway receipt. Whatever may be the value of railway receipts as documents of title according to mercantile usage, a railway company is under no duty to the public to get back the railway receipts on delivery of the goods. It only reserves liberty to refuse, in its discretion, to deliver the goods, unless the railway receipt is produced, or unless, if the receipt is not produced, an indemnity is not given.

Therefore if goods are delivered to a person who is legally entitled to them without production of the railway receipt, any subsequent pledge or endorsement of the railway receipt will not give the pledgee or endorsee a cause of action against the railway company even though the person taking delivery became entitled to them only after delivery but before the pledge or indorsement: Nash v. De Freville, (1900) 2 Q. B. 72 and Brooks v. Mitchell, (1841) 9 M. & W. 15, Dist. [P 142 C 2]

(d) Rights of Common Carrier's Act (1865)—Scope.

Per Wallis, C. J.—The Rights of Common Carriers Act (3 of 1865) and the Indian Railways Act are not in pari materia with the English Carriers Act of 1830. [P 141 C 2]

(e) Railways Act (1890), S. 77—"Loss" covers cases where goods are not forthcoming either from deliberate acts or from acts of negligence.

Per Spencer, J.—The word "loss" in S. 77 is sufficiently wide to cover cases where the goods are not forthcoming either from deliberate acts or from acts of negligence. [P 145 C 1]

 (f) Contract Act (1872), S. 108, Excep. 1—Railway receipts cease to be instruments of title after delivery to person having right to take—Railway receipts left with consignee after delivery is not proximate cause of loss occasioned to subsequent endorsee.

Railway receipts are only symbols of property and they cease to be living instruments of title from the moment they are delivered to a person having a right to take them.

The fact that the railway receipts are left with the consignee after delivery is not the proximate cause of the loss occasioned to a subsequent endorsee. [P 145 C 2]

D. Chamier, R. N. Ayyangar, Grant and Greatorex—for Appellants.

V. V. Srinivasa Ayyangar—for Respondents.

Wallis, C. J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Kumaraswami Sastri, J., in a suit brought by the plaintiff, who was the endorsee for value of two railway receipts, to make the railway company liable for misdelivery. The facts were that the goods in question were consigned by one Gurunatham to his own order to the Madras Harbour Station of the defendant railway. Gurunatham had pledged the railway receipts to the Bank of Madras, and the Bank of Madras were the persons entitled to delivery of the goods. It was intended that one Swaminatha Reddi should pay the bank and get the railway receipts assigned to him and then take delivery of the goods. He managed however to get possession of the goods from the railway company, without production of the railway receipts and before he had paid the bank. This was apparently because, for many years, large consignments of cotton had been consigned by Gurunatham in this way and had been duly taken delivery of by Swaminatha Reddi. Two or three days afterwards, Swaminatha Reddi paid the Bank of Madras and obtained the railway receipts. When that happened, in our opinion, the contract of carriage by the railway company was entirely completed. Swaminatha Reddi, however did not return the railway receipts to the railway company, but committed a fraud on the plaintiff by obtaining an advance against the railway receipts, which were taken, as is usual, to represent that the goods specified in the receipts were still in course of transit, which was not the case, as they had already been delivered to him and had come into his possession as the rightful owner.

In these circumstances, two interesting questions have been raised and very elaborately argued before us. The first question is one of limitation, whether the suit is barred under S. 77, Railways Act, because notice of the claim for compensation for the loss of the goods was not given in writing by the plaintiff, or on his behalf, to the railway within six months from the date of the delivery of the goods for carriage by the railway. The learned Judge held that this section was inapplicable to the present case, because the servants of the railway delivered the goods to Swaminatha Reddi, without the production of the railway receipts and with full knowledge that they were consigned, not to Swaminatha Reddi, but to Gurunatham. Mr. V. V. Srinivasa Ayyangar, who argued this part of the case for the respondent, relied on certain English decisions on the Carriers Act, 1830, which is practically re-enacted in India by Act 3 of 1865. That Act exempted carriers from liability in respect of loss or injury to certain valuable articles, if they were consigned without being declared and the extra charges paid. That Act was construed by the Court of Exchequer in Hearn v. London and South Western Railway Co. (1), where Parke, B., held that the exemption only applied to what I may describe as accidental loss; and similarly in the subsequent case of Morritt v. North-Eastern Railway Co. (2), Blackburn, J., as he then was, also observed that a misdelivery, such as that with which we are dealing, would not be a loss covered by that Act. The Act was also construed in Millen v. Brasch and Co (3), in which it was held, among other things, that delay would be covered by the word "loss" as there used.

These decisions undoubtedly would support Mr. Srinivasa Ayyangar, if the Indian Act was in pari materia with the Carriers Act of 1830, but it is not. That was an Act relieving carriers to a certain extent from their common law liability as insurers; and I may point out that in arriving at that construction Baron Parke, took into account the preamble of the Act and the object with which it was passed. We must do the same with regard to this Act. Ch. 7, Railways Act, 1890, is headed; "Responsibility of Railway Administrations as Carriers," and prima facie is intended to deal with the whole subject. The marginal note, which is not part of the Act but represents, what I gather upon an independent perusal of the section to be, its meaning, describes S. 72 as: "Measure of the general responsibility of a railway administration as a carrier of animals and goods." That measure of general responsibility is said, subject to the other provisions of the Act, to be that of a bailee under Ss. 152 and 161, Contract Act. Now S. 151, Contract Act, deals with the duty of a bailee to take as much care of the goods bailed to him as he would take of his own goods while they are in his custody, and S. 152 says that, in the absence of a special contract, he is not responsible for the loss, destruction or deterioration of the thing bailed, if he takes this amount of care. Then S. 160 provides:

"It is the duty of the bailee to return, or deliver according to the bailor's directions, the goods bailed without demand as soon as the time for which they were bailed has expired, or the purpose for which they were bailed has been accomplished."

Therefore it deals with the duty of the bailee to duly deliver the goods bailed at the proper time; and the marginal note to the section is:

"Return of goods bailed, on expiration of time or accomplishment of purpose."

S 161 provides for the consequence of the bailee's failure to discharge the duty prescribed in that section including the duty of making the delivery. It says:

"If, by the default of the bailee, the goods are not returned, delivered or tendered at the proper time, he is responsible to the bailor for any loss, destruction or deterioration of the goods from that time"

The marginal note is: "Bailee's responsibility when goods are not duly returned." So that these sections of the Contract, Act which are applied by the Indian Railways Act, purport to deal, not merely with the bailee's duty of safe custody, but also with the performance of the bailee's duty to deliver at the proper time. Therefore it seems to me that this Chapter must be taken, and was intended, to cover the whole liability of the railway company, including among other things the responsibility of the railway company for misdelivery, by whatever reason caused. That being so, when we come to S. 77 and find that notice is required in any claim for compensation "for the loss, destruction or deterioration of animals or goods," it seems to me that notice is required in all claims which arise with reference to the liability defined in the earlier sections and in the specified sections of the Contract Act, Ss. 152 and 161, the latter of which covers all cases of nondelivery or misdelivery. In S. 9, Act 3 of 1865, which is reproduced in S.76, Indian Railways Act, it is provided:

"In any suit brought against a common carrier for the loss, damage or nondelivery of goods entrusted to him for carriage, it shall not be necessary for the plaintiff to prove that such loss, damage or nondelivery was owing to the negligence or criminal act of the carrier, his servants or agents."

In S. 76, Railways Act, it was not thought necessary to reproduce the word "nondelivery," the reason being, in my opinion, that cases of nondelivery are already sufficiently provided by the reference to Ss. 152 and 161, Contract Act in the earlier section. In this matter of requiring notice to the railway company within a reasonable time in order to enable them to make inquiries and if possible to recover the goods, there is really no reason for making a distinction between cases in which goods have been delivered inadvertently to the wrong person and cases, such as the present, in which they were delivered to a person other than the consignee who claimed to be entitled to them but did not produce the railway receipt, as he should have done. in support of his claim. We ought not to import distinctions of this sort into the Railways Act, unless they rest upon some basis of sound reason which would be likely to have commended itself to the legislature. I see none such in this case. For these reasons, I think that the cases decided under the Carriers Act, on which the learned Judge relied, are inapplicable, and that the claim is barred because notice was not given as required by S. 77, Railways Act. That would be sufficient to dispose of the present case, but as another interesting question was raised, and it was decided by the learned Judge, I propose to deal with it. It is said that the fact that the railway did not get back the railway receipts when it delivered the goods, ought to make them responsible to the plaintiff for the value of the goods, the plaintiff having on the strength of the production of the railway receipts by Swaminatha Reddi advanced money to him, considering the railway receipts as representing that goods to that value were in transit and in possession of the railway company. Much reliance has been placed on the arguments before us, and some reliance was also placed apparently by the learned Judge, on the fact that the delivery to Swaminatha Reddi when it was made was a wrongful delivery, because at that time he had no right to the goods. But long before Swaminatha Reddi indorsed over the railway receipts to the plaintiff, he had paid the Bank of Madras and obtained the railway receipts, and was therefore the only person entitled to the goods, and also the contract of carriage was at an end. The goods had found their way into the hands of the lawful owner, and therefore no one was prejudiced by the misdelivery, and no injurious consequences followed. There may have been damnum so far as the Bank of Madras was concerned but it was damnum sine injuria.

I think that in the event which happened, the case must be decided as if the railway had made delivery of these goods to Swaminatha Reddi without the production of the railway receipts at a time when he was entitled to them, although he had not brought the railway receipts with him. But even so, it has been contended before us that the action of the Railway, in not getting back the Railway receipts, was such negligence or breach of duty as to make them liable to subsequent transferees for value of the railway receipts. This proposition has been supported mainly on the authority of the case of Nash v. De Freville (4). That was a case of the execution and delivery by the defendant of promissory notes payable on demand. Such an "on demand" note is intended to be a continuing security and cannot be treated as overdue merely because it was indorsed over some years after the date of execution: Brooks v. Mitchell (5). Consequently it remains current in the hands of the payee or indorsee until the maker gets it back; and if, as in the case cited, he omits to get it back, when he pays it, he cannot set up that payment against a subsequent transferee.

Now, it by no means follows that a decision as to a promissory note payable on demand is necessarily applicable to a spent bill of lading or a railway receipt. Indeed the analogy is rather with an overdue note. A bill of lading in origin, as it still is in form, is nothing but a receipt for the goods from the master of the ship to the shipper. But for mercantile convenience and by mercantile usage, it has become a symbol of the goods as explained by Baron Martin in Barber v. Meyerstein (6). As possession could not be given of goods at sea, the bill of lading came to be treated as a symbol of the goods and a transfer of the bill of lading as equivalent to a transfer of the goods themselves. The question of the period during which bill of lading can pass title to the goods, was considered in the leading case of Barber v. Meyerstein (6), to which I have just referred, and the general effect of that decision is, that the property in the goods passes by indorsement of the bill of lading so long as the contract of carriage has not been completed by delivery to the proper consignee. This limitation follows from the very origin of this mercantile custom which, as already stated, depends on the fact that goods in transit are incapable of delivery. But once transit is over and they have come to the possession of the consignee, there is no reason for the goods any longer being held to pass by indorsement of the bill of lading, and no authority has been cited before us for the proposition that they would so pass. The contrary is, in my opinion, clearly assumed in Barber v. Meyerstein (6). At the very beginning of his judgment, Lord Hatherley says:

"The question has really turned upon one point, and I may almost say upon one point alone, namely, whether or not the bills of lading had fully performed their office, and were discharged and spent at the time that the plaintiff took his security. Whether, in other words, the landing of those goods .... was or was not a delivery which had exhausted the whole effect of the bill of lading."

And the case proceeded on the footing that if that was so, any subsequent transfer of the bill of lading would be entirely ineffective. It was held in that case that the stage had not yet been reached. Similarly later on Lord Hatherley says:

"The shipowner contracts that he will deliver the goods on the payment of freight. He discharges his contract when he delivers the goods."

Then Lord Westbury says:

"Unquestionably the bill of lading, as long as the engagement to the shipowner has not been fulfilled, is a living current instrument, and no doubt the transfer of it for value passes the absolute property in the goods."

There is no authority whatever for the proposition that after the bill of lading has ceased to be a living instrument by the delivery of the goods, any dealing with it can affect the property in those goods. Similarly in Sanders v. Maclean (7) Bowen, L. J., observed in a much quoted passage:

"And for the purpose of passing such property in the goods and completing the title of the indorsee to full possession thereof, the bill of lading, until complete delivery of the cargo has been made on shore to some one lightfully claiming under it, remains in force as a symbol, and carries with it not only the full ownership of the goods, but also all rights created by the contract of carriage between the shipper and the shipowner. It is a key which in the hands of a rightful owner is intended to unlock the door of the warehouse, floating or fixed, in which the goods may chance to be."

Now, if that be so with regard to a bill of lading, it is equally so with regard to a railway receipt. The contract of the railway is to carry goods and to deliver them to the consignee. Ordinarily, it would be bound to deliver at its peril to the person entitled at the end of the transit. But S. 57, Railways Act protects the railway, and empowers it to refuse delivery except upon the production of the railway receipt. The terms of the railway receipt show that the railway does not hold itself out as delivering goods only on production of the railway receipt. It only reserves liberty to refuse, in its discretion, to deliver the goods, unless the railway receipt is produced, or unless, if the receipt is not produced, an indemnity is given. There is no reason for saying that the railway holds itself out to the mercantile community as never parting with goods except upon the production of the railway receipt. The railway is not, in my opinion, under any duty to the public or to any body else to insist upon the return of the railway receipt. It is said that mercantile men in India treat railway receipts as documents of title and that the usage has now, at any rate, since the decision of the Privy Council in Ramdas Vithaldas Durbar v. Amerchand & Co. (8) received legal recognition. But that cannot alter the position of the railway company in this respect. It seems to me that the first step in the respondent's position is not established namely, that there was some duty on the part of the railway not to part with the goods except against the railway receipt.

(5) [1841] 9 M. & W. 15.

(7) [1883] 11 Q. B. D. 327.

Apart from that, there is the serious question as to whether what happened could be held to follow from their failure to do so. What happened was, that a fraud and a crime were committed by Swaminatha Reddi in obtaining money from the plaintiff, on a railway receipt for goods that had already been delivered to him at the end of the transit. Reliance has been placed on the maxim laid down in Licbarrow v. Masan (9) that "wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it."

In that case, it was held that, by parting with the bill of lading to the consignee, the consignor had estopped himself from asserting his right to stop in transit against a transferee of the bill of lading from the consignee. It is however well established that there are serious limitations to the general application of this doctrine. In Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities (10) it was held that the carelessness of the Company in leaving its seal in the hands of its secretary, even if it amounted to negligence, did not estop it from disputing forged transfers of its securities made by the secretary under its seal. In the similar decision in Merchants of the Staple v. Bank of England (11) Bowen, L. J., pointed out that there was a distinction between doing that which enabled a fraud to be effected, and being the cause of that fraud, and held that the fraudulent transfer in that case was not the natural consequence of the alleged negligence of the defendant Company, so as to give rise to an estoppel against them. The limitations on this doctrine were further considered in Tarquharson Brothers & Co. v. King & Co. (12) and in the very recent case of Macmillan v. London Joint-Stock Bank (13), where Swinfen Eady, L. J, referred to the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Swan v. North British Australasian Co. (14) that negligence, in order to estop, must be in the transaction itself and must also be the proximate cause of the loss, and Scrutton, L. J., observed at p. 459 (of 1917 2 K.B.)

"I think the effect of the authorities is that if A owing a duty to B, by the neglect of that duty induces B to believe that a certain state of facts, exists, he is estopped as against B from denying that such a state of facts exists. But the neglect must be in the transaction itself, not in previous history.....And the neglect must be the proximate cause of leading B to his belief. Neglect of precautions by A which enable C to commit a crime causing loss to B can never in my view give rise to a claim by B against A, for the loss is not the proximate or even natural consequence of the neglect."

As regards the present case, I think it has not been shown that the railway was under any duty to the public to get back the railway receipts on delivery of the goods and even if there was such a duty, I think on the authorities cited, that would not render the railway liable for the fraud subsequently perpetrated by the holder of the receipts. In the judgment under appeal, the learned Judge observed:

"Had Swaminathan Reddi and Co. on the dates when they obtained delivery of the goods, been the persons who were really entitled to delivery it follows from the authorities above cited that the railway receipts would have exhausted their force and any negotiation subsequent to it by Swaminathan Reddi and Co. would not be operative or pass any title."

That, if I may say so, appears to me to accurately state the effect of the authorities. But the learned Judge went on to make a distinction which I am unable to follow and held the railway liable because at the time of delivery to Swaminatha Reddi, he was not the person entitled to the goods. I have already given my reasons for holding that this circumstance makes no difference, having regard to the fact that Swaminatha Reddi had become entitled to the goods before the date of his transfer of the spent railway receipts to the plaintiff. For these reasons on both grounds, I think the appeal must be allowed and the suit dismissed with costs throughout. I certify for two counsel.

Spencer, J.—I entirely agree. I do not think I can usefully add much to what has fallen from my Lord Chief Justice on the second point which he has discussed in the judgment just delivered. On the question of limitation I cannot follow the learned Judge who tried this case in the opinion that he expressed, that S. 77, Railways Act does not include cases where the railway company have with their eyes open delivered the goods to the wrong person. In Ss. 72 and 77 of the Act, "loss" is coupled with "destruction" or "deterioration" of goods. Now it could not be asserted for a moment that in cases where a railway company found it necessary to destroy goods, say for some necessary purpose, such as to clear their line to avoid danger of life to a passenger train, such destruction would not come within the meaning of destruction of goods in these sections. If destruction is to include deliberate acts of the company or its servants, I cannot see why the word "loss" should only apply to cases where the goods have been mislaid. If the company is liable for negligence, it must a fortiori be liable for wilful acts. I think the intention of the legislature in inserting S. 77 into the Act must have been that by requiring notice to be given before claims are put in, the company might have time to investigate such cases and meet the claims of persons who have suffered loss, if possible, out of Court. The word "loss" in English language is in my opinion sufficiently wide to cover cases where the goods are not forthcoming either from deliberate acts or from acts of negligence, and I see no reason to confine it only to cases of the latter kind.

I therefore agree in thinking that notice not having been given within six months of the consignment of these goods the present suit cannot be maintained. I also agree in thinking that there is no cause of action against the railway company. The plaintiff presents his claim in two ways. Either he says to the railway company:

"Property has passed to me by the pledge of the railway receipts which by mercantile usege represent goods. As I paid money in good faith on the belief that the goods were with you, you must give me the goods, or their value if they have been converted."

Or he says:

"By the negligence of your booking clerk in making over the goods without taking the railway receipts, I was led to believe that I had good security for the loan which I made to Swaminatha Reddi. You are responsible for the misrepresentation made to me and you must compensate me for the loss"

The railway company can in my opinion meet each of these demands in a legal way. Its answer to the first will be this:

"The railway receipts are only symbols of property and they ceased to be living instruments of title from the moment the goods were delivered to a person having a right to take them Swaminathan Reddi had a right to receive the goods and he actually took them before you acquired any interest under the pledge to you. You have been the victim of a fraud, but the transaction, so far as we are concerned, had come to an end before you acquired an interest in the goods: see Barber v. Meyerstein (6)."

To the second, its defence is this:

"It may be that our clerk was negligent but he only risked our responsibility till the receipts were forthcoming. We know nothing of Swaminatha Reddi's subsequent transactions with you and we did not conspire with him to cheat you. We acknowledge no liability to the public to see that our receipts are all collected, and the fact that this receipt happened to be left in the consignee's hands was not a proximate or effective cause of your being cheated nor did it directly lead to that result: see Merchants of the Staple v. Bank of England (11) and Macmillan v. London Joint Stock Bank (13)."

Second Appeal No. 2025 of 1917 Decided on 17th February 1919 against decree of Temporary Sub. Judge, Chingleput, in Appeal Suit No. 106 of 1916.

(a) Transfer of Property Act (4 of 1882), S. 43—Purchaser knowing that sale did not convey interest it purported to convey—S. 43 does not apply.

S. 43 does not apply to the case of a purchaser who knew, at the date of the sale, that the sale did not convey to him the whole interest which it purported to convey. [P 146 C 1]

(b) Transfer of Property Act (4 of 1882), S. 43—Sale by widow of her own and co-widow's interest has no effect on subsequent acquired interest—Hind Law, Widow, Alienation.

Where a Hindu widow sold properties belonging to her and her co-widow and the purchaser knew of the co-widow's interest in the property :

Held, that the purchase would not operate on the interest which the vendor subsequently acquired in her co-widow's share. [P 146 C 1]

C. V. Ananthakrishna Aiyar — for Appellants.

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar and B. Somayya — for Respondents.

Judgment.—It is found by the lower appellate Court that the purchaser was fully aware of the interest of the co-widow of his vendor at the time of the purchase and that, accordingly, there was no erroneous representation to the purchaser that his vendor was authorized to transfer the interest of her co-widow.

The purchaser therefore accepted a sale deed which he was aware did not transfer the interest which it purported to deal with. He was therefore not misled in any way and S. 43, T. P. Act, which is founded on the principles of estoppel, does not apply. Pandiri Bangaram v. Karumoory Subbaraju (1). The decision in Adikesavan Naidu v. Gurunatha Chetti (2) does not in any way affect Pandiri Bangaram v. Karumoory Subbaraju (1). The second appeal is dismissed with costs.

Civil Appeal No. 54 of 1918, Decided on 29th January 1919, from the decree of Temporary Sub. Judge, Sivaganga, in Original Suit No. 105 of 1915.

(a) Contract Act (9 of 1872), Ss. 253, 254 and 256—Exclusive right cannot be asserted by partner with respect to any partnership property—Share can be assertained only after taking accounts.

No partner has a right, at least in the absence of a special agreement, to take any portion of the partnership property and to say that it is his exclusively either during the existence of the partnership or after it has become dissolved. The share of a partner to which he is entitled is his proportion of the partnership assets that have been realized and converted into money after all the partnership debts and liabilities have been paid and discharged. [P 148 C 1]

(b) Contract Act (9 of 1872), Ss. 253, 254 and 256—Partner cannot claim his share and ask to be given his share item of firm's account before all liabilities and assets are realized.

A partner cannot be allowed to take one item of the firm's accounts, divide it into equal shares according to the number of partnership shares, and ask to be given one share, without first having an account taken of the partnership liabilities and deducting the some total of them from the aggregate assets of the firm. 45 I. C. 86, Foll. [P 148 C 1]

(c) Limitation Act (9 of 1908), Art 60, 57 and 115—Nattukottai Chetties—Deposit on thavanai are payable on demand—Art 60, applies—Deposit proved as payable without demand—Art. 57 or Art 115 apply

In the absence of evidence to the contrary deposits made with Nattukottai Chetties on thavanai are deposits payable on demand and come within the definition of deposits under Art. 60, Sch. 1, Lim. Act. If there is evidence however that the money is payable without demand, Art. 57 or Art. 115 would be applicable, according as it is payable at any time after it was lent or after a fixed period. [P 149 C 2; P 150 C 1]

(d) Contract Act (9 of 1872) Ss. 253, 254 and 256—Partner even after dissolution can give valid discharge of debt.

A partner is competent to give a valid discharge of a debt due to the partnership even after its dissolution: 19 I. C. 12; 36 Mad. 544; 13 M. L. T. 268; (1913) M. W. N. 328; 24 M. L. J. 333; 44 I. C. 466 and 41 Mad. 446; 34 M. L. J. 41 Foll. [P 149 C 1]

(e) Evidence Act (10 of 1872), S. 32, (5)—Child's father's statement about date of birth can be proved by person who prepared horoscope.

The evidence of a person who prepared a child's horoscope, as to the statement made to him by the child's father about the date of the child's birth, is admissible in evidence under S. 32 (5) as it is the date of the commencement of a relationship. [P 149 C 1]

K. Srinivasa Aiyangar, K. Rajah Aiyar and T. R. Srinivasarajagopala Aiyangar—for Appellants.

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar—for Respondents.

Spencer, J.—The plaintiff and defendants 1 to 10 represent a firm which was started in Mandalay under the style of A. L. A. M. for doing money lending business, which for brevity, may be referred to as the Mandalay firm. In 1908, defendant 8 in this suit brought a suit in the District Court of Mandalay for dissolution of the partnership of this firm and obtained a decree in which the proportionate shares of the partners were defined, seven in number, and the plaintiff in the present suit was declared to be the owner of one share. While the suit was pending and before the partnership was dissolved, a sum of Rs. 35,239 odd was collected by one Arunachalla Chetty, who was the agent of the Mandalay firm, and this sum was deposited at interest with a firm consisting of defendants 1 to 7 and a stranger who is defendant 11 in this suit, which may be briefly referred to as the Rangoon firm. It may be seen that defendants 1 to 7 are common partners in both the Mandalay and Rangoon firms. The present suit was brought to recover 1/5th share of the money deposited with the Rangoon firm and the temporary Subordinate Judge of Sivaganga has given the plaintiff a decree accordingly. Defendants 3 and 4 appeal and they attack the correctness of the Subordinate Judge's judgment upon two points: (a) that the suit as framed is not maintainable, and (b) that it is time barred

The grounds for saying that the suit is not maintainable are stated in full in grounds 27 to 29 of the appeal memorandum. Although in the written statement of defendant 1 the objection was simply raised that the suit could not be maintained without giving reasons, it appears from the appeal memorandum that the reasons are that the plaintiff's only remedy was to work out the claim as an item of asset in the winding up proceedings of the Mandalay firm under the decree of the District Court, which is Ex. 4 (a), and was confirmed on appeal to the Judicial Commissioner by his judgment Ex. 4 (c). Ground 28 is that "the money having been advanced as a whole and there having been admittedly no division or apportionment among the several partners, it was not competent for the plaintiff to maintain a suit for the recovery of his share alone;" and ground 29 is that "the plaintiff cannot evade the equities arising out of the state of the account between himself and his partners of the Mandalay firm as a whole."

It goes on to state that either a suit should have been brought on behalf of all the partners of the Mandalay firm for recovery of the entire loan or the plaintiff should have taken proper proceedings in execution of the decree of the Mandalay Court. Now on this point, there is no doubt that in England an action may, in the present state of the law, be brought in some cases by one firm against another, although they may have a common partner or partners, or on behalf of a firm to recover a debt due by one of the partners of that firm: see Lindley on Partnership (8th Edn.), p.323. In India, O. 30 R. 9, Civil P. C., recognizes the maintainability of suits between firms and one or more partners of such firms and also suits between firms having one or more partners in common. But a suit does not ordinarily lie if brought by one partner to recover money lent by him to a firm of which he is a member: see Rustomji v. Purshotamdas(1) the reason being that the advance made by one partner would be only one item in the partnership account; nor can one firm sue another when the sole partners of the first firm are partners along with others in the second firm and the claim is to recover as plaintiff's share certain advances made to the second firm before it ceased to do business, see Kashinath Kedari v. Ganesh Hari Narkar (2), the reason being that, without taking a general account it would be impossible to do justice between the parties. It was held in Karri Venkatareddi v. Kollu Narasayya (3) that in certain circumstances one partner can sue another for a partial account. Those circumstances are that the granting of the relief asked for by the plaintiff would not involve the taking of general accounts and would not work injustice to the other partners.

In the same volume of I. L. R. Madras series at p. 203, another case, Sadhu Narayana Aiyangar v. Ramaswami Aiyangar (4), is reported in which it was held that a partner, who has been compelled after dissolution of the partnership to pay a debt due by the partnership, may bring a suit for contribution; but in such a suit it was laid down that the defendant must be given an opportunity of showing, if he can, that on a settlement of accounts the amount payable by him as contribution has been wiped out or reduced. In Gottipatichina Kandiah v. Gottipatinarasappa Naidu (5), to which decision I was a party, a partner was allowed to sue for his share of the collections made by another partner after dissolution of the partnership, on the condition that the defendants were given an opportunity of showing that, if a general account of the partnership transactions were taken, the plaintiff would not be entitled to the share which he claimed. But in another case decided by a different Bench to which my learned brother was a party, Lakshmanan Chetty v. Nagappa Chetty (6), where the plaintiff sued to establish a certain liability against the defendants on the basis of accounts, and he did not ask for accounts to be taken, it was held that the suit was not maintainable. What are the rights of persons in a firm inter se has been clearly set out in Lindley on Partnership at p. 689, 8th Edn. One of these is to have the partnership assets applied in liquidation of the partnership debts and to have the surplus assets divided. This result is usually obtained by the process referred to at p. 614 of having a receiver appointed. The share of a partner to which he is entitled is his proportion of the partnership assets that have been realized and converted into money after all the partnership debts and liabilities have been paid and discharged: see p. 402.

No partner has a right, at least in the absence of a special agreement, to take any portion of the partnership property and to say that it is his exclusively either during the existence of the partnership or after it has been dissolved. The decision in Lakshmanan Chetty v. Nagappa Chetty (6) proceeds upon this principle: see p. 410 of 34 M. L. J. The plaintiff in this suit cannot legally assert any right to a specific portion of the deposit made by his partners with the Rangoon firm. His only right is to take steps for an account being taken of the liabilities and assets of the Mandalay firm and to claim his proportionate share of the balance so arrived at. A partner cannot be allowed to take one item of the firm's assets, divide it into equal shares according to the number of partnership shares, and ask to be given one share without first having an account taken of the partnership liabilities and deducting the sum total of them from the aggregate assets of the firm. This is what the plaintiff has done here. In the plaint there is no prayer for accounts nor has he since applied to amend his plaint. In paras. 1 and 8 of defendant 1's written statement an objection was taken to the maintainability of the suit in its present form without specifying that the suit would have been maintainable if it had been framed differently so as to include a prayer for taking accounts and ascertaining the nett assets of the firm. Under O. 8, R. 2, Civil P. C., it was the duty of defendants to state how the plaintiff's suit was not maintainable, but under O. 7, R. 7, a duty is cast upon the plaintiff in the first instance to state specifically what relief he claims, and he must bear the consequences of his failure to ask for the only thing that he is entitled to get when that thing is not of the nature of general relief. It was for want of a prayer for accounts that the suit concerned in Lakshmanan Chetty v. Nagappa Chetty (6) was held to be not maintainable, and as that appears to be sound law, I think we should follow the decision.

It makes no difference whether the plaintiff is, as he was in that case, a member of the defendant's firm or whether, as here, the defendants or some of them are members of the plaintiff's firm, when in either case the obvious remedy open to the plaintiff is to get the business (in this case the affairs of the Mandalay firm) would up by getting a receiver appointed to collect the partnership assets, to adjust the liabilities of the partners inter se and to distribute the net proceeds after paying the partnership debts. In Sokkanadha Vannimundar v. Sokkanada Vannimundhar (7) and Thiruvengada Mudaliar v. Sadagopa Mudaliar (8), plaintiffs were allowed to sue for their share of assets received by a co-partner after the dissolution of a partnership, but this was not without the defendants being at liberty to reopen the whole accounts of the business. Sadhu Narayana Aiyangar v. Ramaswami Aiyangar (4) dealt with a suit by one partner, who had been compelled to pay the whole of a partnership debt, for contribution against his co-partners. It was not, like this, a suit to recover a share in a partnership debt from the debtors including members of the plaintiff's firm, but it partook of the nature of a suit for contribution, pure and simple. The circumstances of those cases were thus different from those of the present suit. Issues 3 and 4 must now be decided against the plaintiffs. The question of limitation is more difficult. It stands in this way: The sum of Rupees 35,289 odd were placed with the Rangoon firm on 20th August 1908. This suit was instituted on 5th October 1915.

(6) [1918] 45 I. C. 86=34 M. L. J. 408.

(7) [1905] 28 Mad. 344.

(8) [1910] 34 Mad. 112=7 I. C. 811.

The Subordinate Judge has found that plaintiff attained majority on 6th October 1912. If the date 20th October 1908, when repayment of the money became due according to the Thavanai, be taken as the starting point for limitation and if the plaintiff's minority is not treated as entitling him to exception, the suit is time barred. It would equally be barred if three years were to be calculated as running from 15th March 1909, the date of the Mandalay District Court's decree defining the plaintiff's share in the assets of the firm. The Subordinate Judge held that the suit was in time as it was brought within three years of the plaintiff attaining majority. It is now argued by Mr. K. Srinivasa Ayyangar that the plaintiff cannot claim under S. 6, Lim. Act, that time does not begin to run against him till he attained majority as any one of the adult members of the Mandalay firm was competent to give a discharge of the debt without his concurrence and thus the first part of S. 7 of the Act is applicable. He also attacks the Subordinate Judge's finding on the question of fact. The plaintiff in his plaint gives the date of his birth as 8th October 1891. This would make him 21 on 8th October 1912, as a guardian of his property was appointed by the District Court of Madura in Civil Miscellaneous Petition No. 411 of 1900, which had the effect under the Indian Majority Act of extending the attainment of his majority till he completed his 21st year,

The Subordinate Judge has accepted 6th October 1891, which was also the date given by the plaintiff as the date of his birth in another suit, Original Suit No. 257 of 1912 (compare the plaint Ex. E-1), as correct. I see no sufficient reason to differ from this finding. The evidence of P. W. 1 who prepared the plaintiff's horoscope, as to the statement made by plaintiff's father about the date of his son's birth, is admissible under S. 32 (5), Evidence Act, as it was the date of the commencement of a relationship; vide Oriental Government Security Life Assurance Co. Limited v. Narasimha Chari (9) and Amir Ali's Evidence Act, p. 359. No doubt Exs. 2 and 5 throw some doubt on the correctness of the age given in the later proceedings to which the plaintiff was a party, but there is no reason for supposing, in the absence of evidence to that effect, that Ex. D related to another person of the same name as plaintiff. His statement as D. W. 2 that he was not aware, at the time when Exs. 2 and 5 were drawn up, that a guardian had been appointed by Court during his minority, has not been contradicted or shown to be false. If it is taken to be true, it sufficiently explains the circumstances under which he was treated on those occasions as having attained majority earlier than in 1912. The Subordinate Judge's finding on the point must therefore be confirmed. On the question of law we must allow the Full Bench ruling in Mannava Annapurnamma v. Uppala Akkayya (10) and the decision in Palaniappa Chettiar v. Veerappa Chettiar (11) and pronounce in favour of the competence of one of several joint promisees or of one member of a partnership to give a valid discharge of debt due to the joint tenancy or to the firm even after it has been dissolved.

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Ayyar, for the respondent, has endeavoured to support the lower Court's finding on issue 2 which relates to limitation, by arguing that the money in the defendants' hands was a fixed deposit in a bank and that Art. 60, under which time begins to run from the date when a demand is made for payment, is the article of limitation applicable to the case. In the plaint it is asserted that demands were made in December 1914 and at the beginning of September 1915, and this assertion is not denied in the defendants' written statements. In Balakrishnuda v. Narayanasawmy Chetty (12) the learned Chief Justice of this Court, when sitting on the original side, traced the history of Art. 60 Lim. Act, and showed its application to so-called fixed deposits and other deposits with bankers and other bodies doing similar business, if they are repayable on demand and whether they carry interest or not, even if they are of the nature of loans. In a series of subsequent decisions, this Court has repeatedly presumed, in the absence of evidence as to the terms on which the money was handed over, that deposits made with Nattukkottai Chetties, who are the Indian bankers of this part of the country, are payable on demand and come within the definition of deposits under Art. 60: see Ramanathan Chetty v. Subramaniyam Chetty (13), Narayanan Chettyar v. Vellayappa Chettyar (14), Vellayappa Chettiyar v. Unnamalai Achi (15), Muthiah Chettiar v. Ramanatham Chettiar (16) and Chellappa Chetty v. Subramania Chetty (17).

If there is evidence that the money was payable without demand, Art. 57 or Art. 115 would be applicable, according as it was payable at any time after it was lent or after a fixed period. If either of these articles governs this case, the suit is out of time. In this case there is such evidence. Although the terms on which the money was deposited with the Rangoon firm were not embodied in a bond or promissory note, we have the oral evidence of D. W. 1 that in this Thavanai arrangement the investor was not entitled to demand the money till the Thavanai date, but when that date arrived, the person with whom it was invested was bound to repay it immediately and that it was the custom to pay it without any demand being made. There is no other evidence as to the nature of the transaction. The Subordinate Judge has accepted the evidence of this witness on this point and has found that the money was payable without demand. This issue must therefore be decided against the plaintiff. The appeal is allowed and this suit is dismissed with costs in both Courts. Appellants (defendants 3 and 4) are entitled to recover their costs in both Courts from the plaintiff. The defendants who have not appealed will bear their own costs in the lower Court.

Appeal No. 325 of 1917, Decided on 27th November 1918, against the order of Tempy. Sub-Judge, Vellore, D/- 26th March 1917, in Appeal Suit No. 34 of 1917.

(a) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Sch. 2, Para. 16 —Consent to abide by decision of Court is not reference to arbitration.

A consent given by the parties to a suit to abide by the decision of a Court is not such a reference to arbitration as is contemplated by the provisions of Sch. 2 [P 151 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Sch. 2, Para. 16 —Court acting as arbitrator—Award given—No appeal lies.

Where a Court itself acts as arbitrator on a question of fact and gives an award, there is no appeal against its decision, not because the provisions of Sch. 2 apply to the award made by the Court but because a party cannot go back on his consent to abide by the decision of an arbitrator after the award is given. [P. 152 C 1]

(c) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Sch. 2, Para. 16 —Judgment on award contravening provisions of para. 16 is appealable.

A judgment on an award, if it is pronounced in contravention of the provisions of Sch. 2, para. 16, Cl. (1), does not fall under para. 16 (2) and, consequently, there is no prohibition of an appeal from such a judgment. [P 152 C 2]

(d) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Sch. 2, Para. 16 —Award passed on local inspection without allowing time for objections is illegal—High Court has power of interference.

Where, a Court, which is asked to arbitrate, pronounces an award on a mere local inspection and on no legal evidence and without pronouncing on the evidence already adduced and without giving time to the parties to prefer their objections to it, the award is illegal and an appeal lies against it. Even if no appeal were competent in such a case, the High Court would have power to interfere in revision on the ground of material irregularity. [P 153 C 1, 2; P 154 C 1]

(e) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Sch. 2, Para. 16 —Court as arbitrator — Reference by some only of parties—Award does not bind all but only those making reference—Legality.

An award by a Court, which is appointed as arbitrator by some only of the parties, will bind those who join in the reference, but in respect of those who do not, the Court should give its decision on the materials placed before it as a Court. It is illegal for a Court to accept the position of arbitrator when all the parties interested do not join in consenting to such appointment. [P 153 C 1]

(f) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Sch. 2, Para. 16 —Court as arbitrator on reference by some parties only—Award against all parties is not valid—Remand on appeal by those not joining in reference — Whole case is re-opened.

Where an appellate Court remands a case for retrial on the appeal of those defendants who did not join in a reference to arbitration on the ground that the award was not binding on them, the whole case is reopened even in respect of those parties who did not appeal. [P 153 C 1]

M. Patanjali Sastri—for Appellants.

A. Viswanatha Aiyar—for Respondents.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The defendants 1 to 3 and 5 to 8 are the appellants. Defendants 1 to 3 alone and the plaintiff agreed to abide by the decision of the District Munsif passed as an arbitrator. Defendants 4 and 5, who are majors and who are interested in the litigation remained ex parte as also the guardian of the minor defendants 9 and 10. Defendants 6 to 8 are minors represented by their guardians, defendants 1 and 2. So far as defendants 6 to 8 are concerned, it might be taken (though defendants 1 to 3 do not expressly say so in the statement given to the District Munsif) that their guardians, defendants 1 and 2, agreed to abide by the District Munsif's decision on behalf of these minors also. The District Munsif, as such arbitrator, dismissed the plaintiff's suit on a mere inspection of the disputed house sites without referring to the evidence of the plaintiff's witness already examined and apparently without allowing an opportunity to the plaintiff to prove his case further against the ex parte defendants 4, 5, 9 and 10.

On appeal by the plaintiff, the Subordinate Judge set aside the District Munsif's decision on the following grounds: (1) There was no valid reference to arbitration under Sch. 2. para 1, Civil P, C., as defendants 4 to 10 did not join in the reference. (2) The judgment of the Dictrict Munsif (which was also the award) was passed on the date of the award itself, without giving to the plaintiff 10 days' time to apply to set aside the award under Sch. 2, para 16 (1). (3) The reference to arbitration on behalf of the minors (defendants 6 to 8) not having been made with sanction of the Court, the reference was invalid under O. 32, R. 7. The Subordinate Judge accordingly remanded the suit to the District Munsif for fresh disposal according to law. In this appeal against the Subordinate Judge's order of remand it was contended as follows.

Ground 3.—The decision of the District Munsif was in the nature of an award and no appeal lay.

Ground 5.—The lower Court erred in assuming that the provision in para. 1, Sch. 2, Civil P. C. would in terms apply to this case.

Ground 7—No appeal would lie from the decree passed on an award even if it is illegal (evidently Sch. 2, para. 16, Cl. (2) is relied on in this ground).

Two other points not clearly raised in the grounds of appeal were also argued, namely, (1) that defendants 6 to 8 (though their guardians did not expressly state that they give their consent on the minors' behalf) were bound by the consent given by their guardians, (2) that in any event, the decision was voidable by the minors under O. 32, R. 7 (2), and not at the instance of the plaintiff (who appealed to the sub-Court). I think that a consent given by the parties to abide by the decision of a Court is not such a reference to arbitration as is contemplated by the provisions of Sch. 2, Civil P. C. In Nimmagadda Peda Naganna, In re (1) I made the following observations:

"An agreement not to appeal is binding on the parties the consideration being their mutual consent to refer the matter in dispute to the Court as an arbitrator. The application to the Court itself to act as arbitrator is not an application coming under the Civil Procedure Code, Sch. 2, paras. 1 and 2, which paragraphs clearly contemplate the passing of an order of reference under Sch. 2, para. 3, the fixing of a time by the Court in that order for the making of the award by the arbitrator (other than the Court) and the Court's not acting further in the matter till the time expires. They all clearly contemplate a reference to a third person (or third persons other than the Court) as arbitrator or arbitrators. When an award is made by the Court itself acting as arbitrator, there is no separate judgment to be passed as distinguished from the award itself. As said in Nidamarthi Mukkanti v. Thammana Ramayya (2), the decision of the Court 'must be looked on as award.' The Code nowhere contemplates that when the Court itself is the arbitrator, it must first give a separate award, then wait for objections to the award made by itself, hear such objections as a Court to its own award as arbitrator and lastly pronounce judgment on the award if it does not set it-aside. The provisions of the Civil Procedure Code, which are naturally applicable and were clearly intended by the Legislature to apply only to awards made by an arbitrator other than the Court and which are clearly inapplicable and would be almost grotesque when applied to an award made by the Court itself acting as an arbirator, cannot be invoked in the latter class of awards."

I adhere to my above view and hold that where the Court itself acts as an arbitrator on a question of fact, the reason why an appeal does not lie is not because the provisions of Sch 2, Civil P. C, (including the provision in para. 16, Cl. 2, which forbids an appeal in certain cases) apply to the award made by the Court, but because on general principles of jurisprudence a party cannot go back on his consent to abide by the decision of an arbitrator after the award is given just as he cannot resile from the obligations arising from an executed contract. I am aware that in Nidamarthi Mukkanti v. Thammana Ramayya (2) (Bhashyam Aiyangar and Moore, JJ.) the award by the Court is treated on the footing of an award under Ch. 37, old Civil P. C, corresponding to the present Sch. 2, and that Ss. 521 and 522 corresponding to para. 15 and 16, of the new Code, are referred to in the short judgment delivered by the learned Judges. While the decision itself is if I may say so with respect, correct I venture to doubt if the reason based on the assumed applicability of Ss. 521 and 522 can be supported. In Sayad Zain v. Kalabhai Lallubhai (3) the learned Judges say at p. 755,

"here the parties agreed that they would abide by the decision of the Subordinate Judge. The fact that the express provisions of Ch. 38, Civil P. C. were knowingly disregarded, shows that the proceedings were extra cursum curia and thus the judgment of the Subordinate Judge was in the nature of an arbitrator's award against which an appeal cannot be entertained, if the competency of the Appellate Court is objected to by the party holding the judgment See Burgess v. Morton (4).

The learned Judges in this case clearly held that it is not by reason of the provisions of Ch. 38 that the appeal does not lie, but on general principles of jurisprudence. Turning to Burgess v. Morton (4), Lord Halsbury says at p. 138:

"My Lords it has been held in this House that where with the acquiescence of both parties, a Judge departs from the ordinary course of procedure and as in this case decides upon a question of fact, it is incompetent for the parties afterwards to assume that they have then an alternative mode of proceeding and to treat the matter as if it had been heard in due course. * * * *

They are precluded from treating the matter as subject to appeal. The Court of appeal had no jurisdiction to entertain the question."

As Lord Westbury put it in Bickett v. Morris (5), the decisions in these cases proceeded upon the personal incompetency of the parties to raise an objection to the correctness of the Court's award as arbitrator by way of an appeal, and not on any statutory or other provisions. The reasons, therefore given by the learned Subordinate Judge and the contentions of the appellant's vakil based on the provisions of Sch. 2, cannot in my opinion, be supported. I might however state that assuming that the provisions of Sch. 2, do apply to a submission to the Court, the decision in Najm-ud-din Ahmad v. Albert Puech (6), lays down that the judgment on an award, if the judgment is prouounced in contravention of the provisions of Sch. 2, para. 16 (1), does not fall under para. 16 (2) and hence there is no prohibition of an appeal from such a judgment.

The Privy Counsel decision in Ghulam khan v. Muhammad Hussan (7) does not affect thts particular question. There the provisions of the first three paragraphs of S. 522, corresponding to Sch. 2, para. 16, Cl. 1, had been complied with and so the judgment given was a judgment according to those provisions and hence para. 4, S. 522, corresponding to Sch. 2, para. 16, Cl. 2, did apply and their Lordships of the Privy Council, therefore held that no appeal lay. In the present case, the judgment on the award was pronounced without allowing any opportunity for an application to be made to set it aside and hence without hearing and deciding any objection. The decision in Najm-ud-din Ahmad v. Albert Puech (6) directly applies, assuming for argument's sake (as I said before) that Sch. 2 applies to the award made by a Court acting out of its ordinary procedure.

So far as the defendants 6 to 8 are concerned, I am inclined to agree with the appellants' learned vakil that their guardians (defendants 1 and 2) did evidently intend to refer a question of fact to the arbitration of the District Munsif on behalf of the said minors also and the Subordinate Judge's opinion that the award is invalid owing to the minor defendants 6 to 8 not having joined cannot therefore be supported. But he rightly relied on the fact that defendants 4, 5, 9 and 10 did not join in the reference. A perusal of the plaint clearly indicates that defendants 4, 5, 9 and 10 were as much interested in the suit as the other defendants and hence the decision in Vythinatha Aiyar v. Vaithilinga Mudaliar (8) (assuming it to have been rightly decided) has no application, as it was assumed in that case that the ex parte defendants were not interested in the suit. In the result I am inclined to hold that if the District Munsif acted properly in accepting the position of an arbitrator under the circumstances of this case, his judgment, which is in the nature of an award as between the plaintiff and defendants 1 to 3 and 6 to 8, is binding on these parties as between themselves just as a lawful contract is binding on the parties thereto. But the suit as between the plaintiff and defendants 4, 5, 9 and 10 could not be decided by the District Munsif as an arbitrator, and he ought to have given a decision in the suit, so far as they were concerned, on the materials placed before him as a Court. He however dismissed the plaintiff's suit against defendants 4, 5, 9 and 10 also, merely on the impression he formed at his local inspection and on no legal evidence and without pronouncing on the evidence already adduced before him as a Court and without giving an opportunity to the plaintiff to proceed with the trial against those defendants.

It is true that those defendants have not been prejudiced and did not appeal to the Subordinate Judge, the plaintiff who consented to abide by the Court's decision as an arbitrator having been the appellant. But the Subordinate Judge was entitled to consider on appeal the illegality of the District Munsif's judgment passed against the plaintiff in favour of defendants 4, 5, 9 and 10 and to set it aside. It might be said that he should then have set the Munsif's decree aside only so far as it dismissed the plaintiff's suit against those defendants, and not so far as it dismissed the suit against defendants 1 to 3 and 6 to 8. But it would be a wholly inconvenient and anomalous thing that where several defendants have got the same interest, the plaintiff's suit should be dismissed in respect of some defendants and decreed against others. The two decrees would be inconsistent and unworkable. It is, on this ground, that Sch. 2, para. 1, rightly insists that a reference to arbitration, even when made to an arbitrator who is not a Court, should be by "all the parties interested." (The former Code, S. 506, was even more stringent and in its literal sense insisted on all parties, whether interested or not joining in the reference). Though as I said already, para. 1, Sch. 2, does not apply to a case where a Court departing from its function of deciding in the ordinary way is asked to decide a question of fact extra cursum curiae at the request of parties, the Court should follow the rule laid down in Sch. 2, para. 1 (1), and refuse to act as an arbitrator unless all the parties interested agree. In this particular case, the District Munsif acted with material irregularity and illegally in consenting to decide the suit as arbitrator even as between defendants 1 to 3 and 6 to 8 on the one hand and the plaintiff on the other, as defendants 4, 5, 9 and 10, who were interested in the dispute in the same way as the other defendants, did not join and as his decision as an arbitrator would not bind the plaintiff so far as his claim was made against defendants 4, 5, 9 and 10 and the futility of his decision as an arbitrator, when some of the parties did not join, was apparent.

Though the Subordinate Judge did not base his order setting aside the dismissal of the suit against defendants 1 to 3 and 6 to 8 also on the above ground, I think that we might support it on that ground, namely that the District Munsif acted illegally in accepting the position of an arbitrator when all the parties interested did not join in consenting to his acting as such. I might add that the District Munsif seems to have when writing his judgment, forgotten altogether that there were other parties in the suit besides those who consented to abide by his decision on inspection (see para. 4 of his judgment). Finally, even if no appeal lay against the District Munsif's judgment (in the nature of an award) because Sch. 2, Civil P. C., applies to such an award, because it had not been set aside by an application under Sch. 2, para. 15, and because para. 16 (2) also applied, I should be prepared in revision to set aside the District Munsif's decision [see Velu Pillay v. Appasawmi Pandaram (9) and Sita Nath Goswami v. Baikuntha Nath

Goswami (10)] as affected with illegalities and irregularities and I would pass a decision in the same terms as those of the Subordinate Judge. In the result the appeal is dismissed; but as the plaintiff's own conduct led to the illegal decision of the District Munsif, I would make no order as to costs.

Spencer, J.—I agree. In Nidhamarthi Mukkanti v. Thammana Ramayya (2), Sayad Zain v. Kalabhai Lallubhai (3) and Sita Nath Goswami v. Baikunta Nath Goswami (10), which are all cases of Munsifs or Judges arbitrating between the parties in suits over which they had jurisdiction, it is stated that their decision in each case "must be looked on as an award" or "was in the nature of an arbitrator's award." In the lastnamed case Chitty, J., goes so far as to say it was an award, and in this and the Madras case allusions are made to the sections of the old Code which provide for references to arbitration. But I agree with my learned brother that parties who give their consent to the Court itself acting as an arbitrator are debarred from afterwards questioning the Court's decision, not by reason of the procedure prescribed in the Code, but because they are bound by their agreement. In this case, even if the District Munsif's decision is treated as falling under the rules laid down in Sch. 2, Civil P. C., an appeal lies on the authority of Najm-ud-din Ahmad v. Albert Puech (6) on account of that Court's failure to allow time for objections before passing its decree. I feel some hesitation in assuming, as was done in Ishar Das v. Keshab Deo (11) and Vythinatha Aiyar v. Vaithilinga Mudaliar (8), that all parties, who remain ex parte at the trial of a suit, even if they are minors or persons whose presence is necessary to enable the Court to adjudicate effectually and completely on the issues, are not "parties interested" within the meaning of para. 1, Sch. 2, Civil P. C. I think that the plaintiff was entitled and bound to prove his claim against those parties who did not join in the agreement to have the suit decided in a particular manner, and I hold that even if no appeal lay to the Sub-Court against the District Munsif's decision, we should not interfere with an order which we should ourselves have passed if the matter had come up to this Court on revision, especially when it is one that, as it stands, does substantial justice between the parties. The civil miscellaneous appeal should therefore be dismissed on the terms proposed.

OLDFIELD, SESHAGIRI AIYAR AND BAKEWELL, JJ.

Rajagopala Aiyangar—Appellant.

v.

Singaravelu Thevan and others—Respondents.

Letters Patent Appeal No. 49 of 1918, Decided on 7th March 1919, from judgment of Spencer, J., in Appeal Suit No. 223 of 1917.

* Hindu Law — Partition—Father taking his share — Grandfather and grandson can continue joint.

There is no rule of Hindu Law that a father cannot separate himself without disrupting the joint family. He can leave the family after taking his own share, just as any other coparcener who is not a father can do. When, therefore, a man becomes divided from his father, his sons retain a joint status with the latter. [P 157 C 1, 2]

By a deed of partition one S, his son and grandson as representing one branch and his brother Sevu and his sons and grandsons as representing the other branch effected a division of their family properties, the reason being that U., the son of S., was leading an extravagant life. The properties were divided into two shares; one share was allotted to Sevu's branch and one-twelfth out of the other share was given to U. and the rest to S and the son of U. The share of U. alone was specified:

Held, that both by law and by the construction of the document S. and his grandson, i. e, the son of U. did not become separated inter se. [P 157 C 1]

K. Bhasyam Aiyangar—for Appellant.

S. Vardachariar—for Respondents.

Oldfield, J. The suit, out of which this letters patent appeal arises, was brought on a mortgage executed by defendants 1 and 3, and the only question is whether the minor defendant 2, respondent 2, grandson of defendant 1 and nephew of defendant 3, is liable as a member of joint family composed of them and the sons of defendant 3, defendants 4 and 5. The appeal is against the decision of Spencer, J., that he is not liable, having ceased to be a member of the joint family in 1905, when a partition evidenced by Ex. 1 took place.

In 1905 the family was composed of those already referred to, Uthrapathi, the father of defendant 2, and Sevu, the brother of defendant 1, with his two sons. Under Ex. 1, the family property was divided into four portions, one being allotted to defendants, 1, 2 and 3, one to Uthrapathi, one to Sevu and his sons and one being retained as the common property of defendants 1, 2 and 3, and Sevu's branches, each to enjoy half the produce. Spencer, J., held and respondents contend that defendant 2, did not become a member of a co-parcenary with defendants 1 and 3. The question is whether this conclusion is right. Here, Mr. Varadachari for respondents has, as I understood him argued that, when a father has become divided from the grandfather or from collaterals, his son either cannot or at least must be presumed not to retain a joint status with the latter.

This contention, whatever its exact scope, is, in my opinion, without substance. The right of a co-parcener to claim partition against his grandfather and against his father's collaterals was recognized in Nagalinga Mudali v. Subbiramaniya Mudali (1) and Subba Ayyar v. Ganasa Ayyar (2), as co extensive with his right to claim it against any other member of the family, and the same is implied in the judgments in Manjanath v. Narayana (3). For respondents reliance has been placed on the dicta of Muthuswami Ayyar, J., in the latter case, tha the argument being that, where and so far as a joint family originally consists in branches, division in which each is regarded as a unit, is all that is contemplated by the learned Judge; and reference has also been made to the description of Bhashyam Ayyangar, J., in Sudarsanam Maistri v. Narasimhulu Maistri (4), of the joint family as forming corporate bodies within a larger corporate body, each capable of owning or acquiring property. But in the first of these cases, apart from the general tendency of the decision, the learned Judge was not concerned with the effect of division on status but only with the method by which shares should be calculated; and I would respectfully adopt the opinion expressed in the present case by the learned Chief Justice that the indication of that method in a particular deed for the purpose of the severance of particular members entails nothing as to the intention of others or of these members inter se to remain joint. In the second case the question was of a partition, but it was not of ordinarily divisible property but of the rights of the co-parceners or a group of them to property separately acquired by such group. There is, so far as has been shown, no special restriction on a partition, to which a grandson or nephew is a party, and no special presumption arises in respect of it, the ruling being only that stated in Balabux v. Rukhmabai (5), that it must be proved like any other fact.

> "as between different branches division should be by the stock and that when a joint family is broken up by division, regard should be had to the successive vested interests of each branch,"

In this case the principal evidence as to the intention of those concerned consists in the terms of the partition deed Ex. 1, and as they are clear, it is unnecessary and it would not be admissible to consider the other evidence on the record relating to subsequent conduct. Ex. 1 is headed "partition deed"; its last clause refers to the parties to it as henceforth bound by no pecuniary relations but only those of friendship; another clause refers to division of moveables as having already taken place; and these are the only portions of the document relied on as directly supporting a complete division.

But the two first are common features of partition transactions, which might easily be included, whatever the particular intention, and the last is inconclusive in the absence of details as to the shares of those who received them. On the other hand the stated motive for the partition, Uthrapathi's extravagance, afford strong reason for holding that, although there is nothing definite on the point, the remaining members of his branch intended to make no further change than his exclusion involved and to hold the property assigned to them as joint tenants; and this is particularly clear as regards the share of the property to be held by them in common with Sevu's branch, of which division was deferred. For the view for which respondents contend, Uthrapathi, as the natural guardian of defendant 2, would have been able at any time to nullify the arrangement and by compelling a division to obtain control of his son's share. Spencer, J., in fact drew an inference from the reference in Ex. 1 to defendant 1 as defendant 2's guardian and the absence of similar refeence in the case of defendant 3's minor sons in favour of the divided status of each of them. But, with all due deference, the inference is the other way. For whilst no special reference to the guardian of the latter would be necessary when their father, defendant 3, was executing the document, and there was no conflict of interests between them and him, the case was different between defendant 2 and Uthrapathi, who was to be excluded; and the mention of defendant 1 as the former's guardian in the first clause is intelligible only on the assumption that he was the managing member of a joint family, to which both belonged. The allegation that all the members of the family became divided in status, but that some of them were to hold portions of the property as tenants-in-common is improbable in the extreme and, in the absence of anything in Ex. 1 to support it, cannot be accepted. Construing Ex. 1 in what appears to me the manner naturally consistent with its terms, I would allow the appeal and modify the decree of the Subordinate Judge by making defendant 2's share liable under the suit mortgage, as found by the lower Court's judgment. The time allowed to defendant 2 for payment is 3 months from this date. Defendant 2 will pay plaintiff's costs throughout.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—By Ex. 1 one Singaravelu, his sons and grandsons, as representing one branch, and his brother Sevu and his sons, as representing the other branch, effected a division of their family properties. The occasion for this arrangement, as recited in the deed, was because Uthrapathi, the son of Singaravelu, was leading an immoral life and wasting the family property. The properties were divided into two shares and after allotting one share to Sevu and his sons, in the other share one-twelfth of the whole property was given to Uthrapathi. There was a question whether one-twelfth was the proper share which was due to Uthrapathi. There was also another question as to whether he got any share in certain properties which were left undivided. In this Letters Patent appeal we are not concerned with these minor questions. The point in dispute is whether by this partition there was a severance of interest among the members of Singaravelu's branch inter se, or whether it was an arrangement by which Uthrapathi alone was sent out of the family, the other members remaining undivided. Spencer, J., has discussed some questions relating to presumptions as to partition in a Hindu family being partial or complete. With all deference, I am unable to see any necessity for discussing such a question, where the construction of a document is what we are concerned with. The presumptions the learned Judge referred to may probably help if there is any difficulty in construing the deed of partition. In the opinion I have formed of its contents I find no ambiguity in the document which would enable me to seek the aid of extraneous evidence to construe it.

Mr. Varadachariar relied upon some recitals in the deed as indicating that the partition was intended to sever the interests per se of the members of Singaravelu's family. He alluded to the fact that the minor was represented by a guardian. I do not consider that that circumstance has any bearing upon the question. His interests had to be safeguarded anyhow, and the very fact that the father who was the legal guardian was discarded in favour of the grandfather, indicates that the father was to be sent out of the family. The next circumstance which the learned vakil relied on was the fact that the two main branches entered into the partition. The point he raised was if the object was to send away Uthrapathi alone, why should there be a division between the two main branches. The answer is plain. Sevu apparently did not want to have anything to do with his spendthrift nephew, and he naturally asked his brother to separate his share. The next circumstances relied on was the clause at the end of the partition deed that the members mentioned in the deed should have no more connexion with each other. Persons acquainted with this part of India would not attach any special significance to such a clause. It is a formula adopted invariably in every deed of partition; and it would not have entered into the head of the draftsman to think that he was by this clause providing for the separation of the son from the father.

These are all the facts relied on by the learned vakil. On the other hand, there is an omission in Ex. 1 which is almost conclusive against an intention to effect a severance inter se. Whereas the share of Uthrapathi is set apart and a special schedule is annexed to represent his share, no such schedule of special shares of the grandfather and of the grandsons separately was annexed. This shows that it was the intention of the parties that the son should go out of the family leaving the father and the grandsons undivided. I feel very little doubt in arriving at the conclusion that the document did not affect a partition inter se among the members of the branch of Singaravelu. Notwithstanding this conclusion on the facts Mr. Varadachariar's question of law has to be decided. He said that on the language of the instrument the legal consequence necessarily follows that the father Uthrapathi and his son Manikam were divided. If I understood the learned vakil aright his contention was that, as the principle of division in Hindu families is per stirpes and not per capita, the allotment of a share to the father carried with it the separation of his son from the main branch; he further argued that the fact that the son's share was not specifically set apart cannot weigh against this principle of Hindu law. I do not agree with this contention.

There is no rule, as I understand it, in Hindu law that a father cannot separate himself without disrupting the joint family. He can leave the family after taking his own share just as any other co-parcener, who is not a father, can do. The Hindu law clothes him with a further right of effecting a partition among his sons, whether they like it or not. The reference of the learned vakil to the theory which for a long time gained currency in Bombay, that a minor son cannot sue for partition against the wish of his father, does not lend any support to this contention. Moreover, as against the view in Apaji Narhar Kulkarni v. Ramchandra Ravji Kulkarni (6) it may be mentioned that for a long time beginning with Nagalinga Mudali v. Subbramania Mudali (1) the view in Madras had been consistent that a minor son can compel the father to give him his share. The decision in Manjanatha v. Narayana (3) strongly supports the view taken by the learned Chief Justice. That was a case of the sons bringing suits against their father, and uncles and cousins. There was a decree in the suit. After the share of these sons had been separated, the question arose whether the other members of the family remained undivided. Muthuswami Ayyar, J. in a very elaborate judgment held that the suit of the sons did not effect a severance of the family in its entirety. This is what he said:

> "It seems to me anomalous to hold that in a case where two brothers, each of whom may have several sons and grandsons, desire to separate, all the members should be forced to separate the sons and grandsons from their father and grandfather.....Again, it appears to me that each co-parcener is at liberty to elect to separate from the joint family, but I am aware of no text which recognizes his power to force a separation among others against their will."

I think that the principle above enunciated applies with equal force to the present case. In a later case, Sudarsanam Maistri v. Narasimhulu Maistri (4), Bhashyam Ayyangar, J., said this:

> "According to usage and custom, the remaining members of an undivided family, from which one or more alone has become divided, continue as an undivided family in its normal state and not as members who after partition have become reunited."

If I may say so, this exactly represents the practice which prevails throughout the whole of Southern India. For these reasons I am of opinion that by allotting a share to Uthrapathi neither by law nor by the construction of the document Singaravelu, the father, and Manickam the grandson, became separated inter se. The effect of the deed was to leave these two members undivided, while the son alone ceased to belong to the joint family. I therefore agree with the conclusion at which the learned Chief Justice has arrived and would allow this appeal with costs.

Bakewell, J.—I agree.

In order to obtain an injunction or the appointment of a Receiver the applicant has to show that the property is in danger of being wasted or alienated and should be preserved from waste or alienation; but while in order to secure an injunction it is enough to show that the applicant has a fair question to raise as to the existence of the right alleged, the Court will not ordinarily appoint a Receiver while one party is actually in possession and an irreparable wrong may be done to him by the Court taking interim possession of the property. Order—In this petition the appellant in Appeal No. 324 of 1918 on the file of this Court moves for the appointment of a receiver for the properties of the Sivagiri Zamin, which are in the hands of respondent 1 to the appeal as he has succeeded in the suit to establish his right to the zamindary properties. The motion is based on three allegations of waste: (i) alienation of 114 kotahs of land at a gross undervalue, about 1/9th if their real worth, (ii) indiscriminate cutting of timber trees and (iii) removal of melvaram paddy by the raiyats. The matter was before their Lordships the Chief Justice and Napier, J., in March of this year and they then decided that the appointment of a receiver was as things then stood, unnecessary and directed that respondent 1 should have possession of the plaint properties on furnishing security in 1½ (one and a half) lakhs of rupees, representing two years' income of the properties the subject of the appeal. It was brought to the notice of their Lordships that respondent 1 had entered into an agreement (Ex. 45 in the case) to alienate 100 kotahs of land to various persons who were financing him in his litigation. The learned Chief Justice, however remarked that the conveyance of the property had not then been carried out and might never take place. It is undisputed before me that not only has the conveyance of the 100 kotahs taken place but an additional 14 kotahs have also since been transferred. Respondent 1 only entered into possession of the property in March last in execution of the decree passed in his favour. Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar for respondent 1, offers to submit to a temporary injunction restraining the respondent from further alienating the corpus of the property pending the appeal, and the question is whether this is sufficient in the circumstances of this case.

As to the cutting and selling of timber it is objected by respondent 1 that the evidence of this is furnished largely by the very raiyats who are responsible for the removal of the melvaram crops. I am satisfied, however on the affidavits that there is some ground for thinking that timber may have been improperly cut and sold and the ordinary cutting of leased crops has been exceeded. As to the crops, any damage is amply covered by the security already furnished by respondent 1, and this point need not be considered. Assuming that acts of waste have been proved by the alienations referred to and by the cutting and selling of timber trees the question arises whether I ought in these circumstances to appoint a receiver. Proof of waste is certainly a ground for such appointment. Compare Sivagnanathammal v. Arunachalam Pillai (1). On the other hand, the distinction laid down in Chandidat Jha v. Padmanand Singh Bahadur (2) between the cases in which an injunction will issue and a receiver be appointed is as follows:

"The distinction seems to be that while in either case it must be shown that the property should be preserved from waste or alienation, in the former case, it would be sufficient if it be shown that the plaintiff in the suit has a fair question to raise as to the existence of the right alleged; while in the latter case a good prima facie title has to be made out."

Here of course the respondent is in possession and his title has been established. In the leading case of Owen v. Homan (3) it is said

"that where the object of the plaintiff is to assert a right to property of which the defendant is in the enjoyment, the case is necessarily involved in further questions. The Court by taking possession at the instance of the plaintiff may be doing a wrong to the defendant, in some cases an irreparable wrong If the plaintiff should eventually fail in establishing his right against the defendant, the Court may by its interim interference have caused mischief to the defendant for which the subsequent restoration of the property may afford no adequate compensation."

In this case it is of course impossible to say that the petitioner (appellant) has a better prima facie title than respondent 1: see Sivaji Raja Sahib v. Aiswariyanandaji Sahib (4). I have therefore come to the conclusion that a receiver should be refused, but a temporary injunction will be granted restraining respondent 1 from making any further permanent alienation of the immovable property belonging to the zamin during the pendency of the appeal or until further orders. In my opinion the injunction should be extended to prevent him also from cutting or selling any trees except in the ordinary way by leasing crops or in the usual course of husbandry, for which of course, respondent 1 will continue to maintain accounts. The petition is dismissed without costs.

First Appeal No. 159 of 1918, Decided on 4th February 1919, from decree of Sub.-Judge, Tinnevelly, in Original Suit No. 1 of 1917.

(a) Civil P C. (1908), S. 92—Suit for declaration of invalidity of appointment of a trustee by temple committee and for injunction for restraining him from acting is one under S. 92—Sanction is essential—It is one for direction for administration of public trust and falls under Cl. (1) (h)—It does not fall under Religious Endowment Act (20 of 1863), S. 14.

A suit for a declaration that the appointment of a trustee by a temple committee is invalid and for an injunction restraining him from entering on his duties or interfering with the affairs of the temple and its properties is a suit virtually for the removal of a trustee and is not maintainable without the requisite sanction under S. 92. The suit may also be treated as one in which direction of the Court is necessary for the administration of a public trust and falls under the section, at least under Cl. (h), sub-S. (1): 4 M. H. C. R. 2; 7 M. H. C. R. 117 and 4 I. C. 874, Dist.

Such a suit does not come within the scope of S. 14, Religious Endowments Act. [P160 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 92—Appointment of trustee by temple committee if not in good faith can be questioned in suit.

A Civil Court can question the appointment of a trustee by a Devasthanam Committee, if the appointment is not made reasonably and in good faith. [P 159 C 2]

T. Rangachariar—for Appellants.

T. R. Ramachandra Iyer—for Defendants.

Abdur Rahim, J.—I am not disposed to agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. The suit is instituted by two out of three trustees of a temple for a declaration that the appointment of defendant 8 which is practically in the vacancy created by the death of the third trustee, by the Devasthanam Committee is invalid and for an injunction restraining him from interfering with the affairs and the property of the temple. It is alleged in the plaint that this is not a proper appointment inasmuch as there was improper understanding between some of the members of the Committee and defendant 8 as regards the former obtaining lease of certain buildings belonging to the temple at less than the proper rent. It is further alleged that defendant 8 had agreed in consideration of his appointment to grant certain sites to some of the members of the Committee in the names of third persons. If those allegations are well founded in fact—and that is a matter which could only be investigated at the trial—the appointment of defendant 8 could not be said to be either reasonable or made in good faith. There are a number of rulings of this Court which lay down the principle that a civil Court can question an appointment of a trustee by a Devasthanam Committeee, if it is not made resonably or in good faith [vide Thiruvengadatha Aiyangar v. Ponnappa Aiyangar (1), Tirumalaiyappa Pillai v. Vengu Aiyar (2), Ganapathi Ayyar v. Vedavyasa Alasinga Bhattar (3), Seshadri Ayyangar v. Nataraja Ayyar (4), and also the general observations of the learned Chief Justice and Seshagiri Aiyar, J., in Sitharama Chetty v. Subramania Aiyar (5). In Thiruvengatha Aiyangar v. Ponnappa Aiyangar (1) the appointment under consideration was that of additional trustees: in Ganapathi Ayyar v. Vedavyasa Alasinga Bhattar (3) the question was as regards the power of the Board of Revenue altering the scheme of management, and in Seshadri Ayyangar v. Nataraja Ayyar (4) the question which the civil Court was asked to decide was the propriety of the suspension of a trustee by the Committee. But the principle applied in those cases would apply equally to the case of an improper appointment of a trustee in a vacancy caused by the death of a trustee.

But then the learned pleaders for the respondents have argued that the suit would not lie because no sanction was obtained under S. 14, Act 20 of 1863 or under S. 92, Civil P. C. As regards the first, I do not think the present suit comes within the scope of that Act. It is not a case of misfeasance, breach of trust or neglect of duty committed by a trustee. But I am of opinion that S. 92, Civil P. C., does apply. This is a case which may properly be described as one in which direction of the Court is necessary for the administration of the public trust within the meaning of that section, as held in Neti Rama Jogiah v. Venkatacharlu (6) and in Kalisawar Gurukkal v. Nataraja Tambiram (7). The mere fact that defendant 8 had not yet taken charge of his office or taken possession of the properties as a co-trustee with the plaintiffs cannot make any difference, because the object of the suit is to obtain the direction of the Court as to whether the plaintffs alone are to act in the matter of the trust or they must so act in conjunction with defendant 8. That view is supported by an observation of the Privy Council in Bishen Chand Basawat v. Nadir Hossein (8), as pointed out in Kaliswara Gurukkal v. Nataraja Tambiran (7).

Mr. T. Rangachariar, the learned vakil for the appellants, however, argued that this is not a case for the removal of any trustee or for any other relief enumerated under S. 92, Civil P. C. Ordinarily, the removal of a trustee would mean the removal of a trustee from office by reason of some act or omission in connexion with his office of trustee, and here defendant 8 has not, as already stated, entered upon the duties of trustee at all. But he has been undoubtedly appointed by the Devasthanam Committee by proceedings held according to the rules. Therefore, the Devasthanam Committee, so far as they are concerned, having the power to appoint a trustee, have done what they could in order to clothe defendant 8 with the status and power of a trustee.

At the same time I am rather doubtful whether the prayer in the plaint comes within the words "removing any trustee." Even if they do not I have no doubt that the relief is one which is contemplated by the residuary relief No. (h) under S. 92, sub S. (1), Civil P. C. Clause (h) says :

"Granting such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require."

The object of this suit is to have it declared that defendant 8 is not a trustee properly appointed and also to prevent him from acting in the capacity of a trustee. I should say that that is a relief cognate to removing a trustee. It was also argued by Mr. Rangachariar that suits by trustees do not come within S. 92, Civil P. C. But I do not think that that contention is at all sound, snd no authority has been cited in support of that proposition. If the terms of S. 92, Civil P. C., apply to a suit by trustees, there is no apparent reason why such a suit should be held to be exempted from its restrictive provisions. The plaintiffs not having obtained any sanction under S. 92 of the Code the suit is not maintainable. In the result the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Spencer, J.—I am of opinion that S. 92, Civil P. C., is a bar to the maintenance of the present suit. The decisions in Jeyangarulavaru v. Durma Doosji (9), Ponnambala Mudaliyar v. Varaguna Rama Pandia Chinnatambiar (10), and Samaram Singaracharlar v. Krishhaswami Iyengar (11), which were cited in the arguments, being all prior to the enactment of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908, in which Cl. (a), sub-S. (1), S. 92, and sub-S. (2), appeared for the first time, must be read in the light of the law as it then was. In effect this is a suit for the removal of a trustee from his office. No doubt the relief asked for in the plaint is for a declaration that the appointment of defendant 8 is invalid and for a permanent injunction restraining him from interfering with the affairs of the temple. But it cannot be denied that defendant 8 has been appointed as a trustee by a statutary body competent to make the appointment and therefore he is a trustee until he is removed from his office by a competent authority. There was at the time of appointment an existing vacancy, and under Act 20 of 1863 the Devasthanam Committee have an inherent right to make appointments of trustees whenever vacancies occur. It is immaterial for the purposes of this suit what motives the members of the Committee had for making this particular appointment. They have as much power to appoint a bad man as trustee as to appoint a good man, in the exercise of their discretion. This is in fact an appointment of a man who, the plaintiffs say, ought not to be appointed, and the only means of getting rid of him is to bring a suit for his removal from office. The language of S. 92, sub-S. (2), Civil P. C., is very clear. It declares that no suit claiming any of the reliefs specified in sub-S (1) shall be instituted in respect of any such trust as is referred to in section, except in conformity with the provisions of sub-S. (1). One of the reliefs is that of removing a trustee. The only exception to this is the case where a trustee is sought to be removed under S. 14, Act 20 of 1863 for misfeasance or neglect of duly. In either case sanction is required, either the sanction of the Advocate-General or the sanction of the District Court, and as the present suit has been instituted without sanction, it is not sustainable. I therefore agree with my learned brother that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

No Court has the jurisdiction to annul, as such, a transfer amounting to a fraudulent preference or a voluntary transfer made within two years of an adjudication, except a Court excercising insolvency jurisdiction in proceedings which have been instituted to declare the debtor, who made the transfer, insolvent by a petition duly presented under the Act. Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The Full Bench decision in 30 Mad. 169 (F.B.) should not be extended so as to enable a defendant to raise an equitable defence, if the Court before which it is raised would not have jurisdiction to entertain a suit if brought by the defendant to obtain the relief of cancellation based on the right put forward as the basis of the equitable defence. Where the right to grant such a relief is, by Statute law, vested in a special tribunal the defence cannot be pleaded before another tribunal not vested with such powers. A transfer therefore falling under S. 36 remain. valid till set aside by the insolvency Court at the instance of the receiver and the voidability of the transfer cannot be pleaded as a defence in any Court till it is set aside. T. M. Krishnaswami Ayyar and E. Vinayaga Row—for Appellant.

T. R. Venkatarama Sastri and G. R. Sivaramakrishna Ayyar—for Respondents.

Spencer, J.—The plaintiff is the wife of defendant 2. She purchased the suit peoperty from him on 5th August 1912, the consideration for the sale being the debt to her which he had incurred for meeting the expenses of a certain litigation between himself and his father, for which he had pledged his wife's jewels. Defendant 1 was a creditor of defendant 2 and brought Original Suit No. 324 of 1913 in the Court of the District Munsif of Tinnevelly against him and got the suit property attached before judgment. The plaintiff put in a claim petition but it was dismissed on 2nd December 1913. On a debtor's petition presented in the District Court on 15th September 1913 defendant 2 was on 12th December 1913 declared insolvent. The Official Receiver sold the suit property by auction on 31st July 1914 and defendant 3 purchased it.

The plaintiff brought this suit to establish her title and has been successful in the lower Courts in obtaining a declaration of her title, both the Additional District Munsif and the District Judge finding that the sale by plaintiff's husband in her favour was a genuine one for good consideration. They also held that the sale by the Official Receiver was a nullity for want of a vesting order, citing the opinion of Moore, J., in Official Receiver of Trichinopoly v. Somasundaram Chettiar (1). The proceedings in which defendant 2 was adjudicated insolvent are not in the records of this second appeal. Assuming that those proceedings were regular and that under Ss. 16 (2) (a) Provincial Insolvency Act, the insolvent's property by the order of adjudication ipso facto became vested in the Official Receiver, there are other obstacles in the way of defendant 3 who purchased the property from the Official Receiver and is the appellant in this second appeal. The defect in his title consists in the admitted fact that the transfer of the suit property by the insolvent to the plaintiff has not been annulled by the Court of insolvency either under S. 36 or S. 37, Provincial Insolvency Act. "The Court" in Ss. 36 and 37 signifies the Court excercising jurisdiction under that Act: see the definition in S. 2 (g), Provincial Inselvency Act), which in the present case was the District Court. I am of opinion that no Court has the jurisdiction to annul, as such, a transfer amounting to a fraudulent preference or a voluntary transfer made within two years of the adjudication, except a Court exercising insolvency jurisdiction in proceedings which have been instituted to declare the debtor, who made the transfer, insolvent by a petition duly presented under the Act. In Gandla Veerama v. Ramaswamiah Garu (2) it was held by Phillips and Krishnan, JJ., that a receiver appointed by a Court of insolvency could bring a regular suit in another Court to set aside a transaction under S. 36, Provincial Insolvency Act, but, with due respect, I feel doubt whether that decision was right. I do not think that a special statutory provision whereby District Courts and certain other Courts are invested by notification of the Local Government under S. 3 (1) with the power among other powers of invalidating certain defined transactions of insolvents should be extended to all Courts of original jurisdiction whether notified under this Act or not. Otherwise conflicts might arise between the decision of a Court sitting in insolvency and the judgment of another Court exercising ordinary original jurisdiction. Transfers of this kind, if they do not fall under S. 53, T.P. Act, would, in the absence of any provision to the contrary, be valid transfers.

I further agree with the view taken in Hemraj Champa Lall v. Ramkishen Ram (3) and in Kauleshar Ram v. Bhawan Prasad (4) that it is the Official Receiver who must set the Court in motion to annul a transfer under S. 36 or S. 37. These sections speak of such transfers as being "void against the receiver", not void against all the world.

On the analogy of the English Bankruptcy Act it has been laid down in three decisions of this Court that "void" in S. 36, Provincial Insolvency Act, and in the corresponding S. 55, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, means "voidable" see Abdul Kadhar v. Official Assignee of Madras (5), Sankaranarayana Aiyar v. Alagiri Aiyar (6) and Official Receiver of Trichinopoly v. Somasundaram Chettiar (1).

An additional reason was given by my learned brother in the latter case, viz. that the Act makes the intervention of the Court necessary, which would not be so if such a transfer was void ab initio. It has been held by another Bench of this Court in Ussam Kassim Sait v. Palat Mammad Koya (7) that even the word "void" in S. 37, Provincial Insolvency Act, only means "voidable", although that section leaves the Court no discretion in the matter, by declaring that every transfer of property which amounts to a fraudulent preference "shall be annulled by the Court," the words in S. 36, being "may be annulled." It is enough for this appeal that "void" in S. 36, means "voidable."

The appellant's pleader, citing the Full Bench case of Lakshmi Doss v. Roop Laul (8), argues that he should be allowed to raise the voidability of the transaction in plaintiff's favour as an equitable defence in this suit, and further contends that the Official Receiver, when he sold the insolvent's property by auction, sufficiently indicated his intention of exercising his discretion towards the avoidance of the sale to the plaintiff.

But that is not enough. The transfer has not been annulled by the insolvency Court. The appellant cannot be allowed, for the purposes of this suit, to stand in the shoes of the Official Receiver, an officer of Court, who has not been made a party, and to raise a defence involving the decision of a point which it is only within the jurisdiction of a Court dealing with the estate in insolvency to decide.

Moreover, the transfer to the plaintiff, looked at from the point of view of S. 36, is not a voluntary transfer, as both Courts have found that there was consideration for it. For the application of S. 37, it was not made within three months of the presentation of the petition on which the adjudication was made. Even regarded as a transfer in fraud of creditors it could, under the authority of Palaniandi Chetty v. Appavu Chettyar (9) and Subramania Ayyar v. Muttia Chettiar (10), only be avoided by a suit instituted for the purpose of having it set aside.

The appeal therefore fails from every point of view and is dismissed with costs.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The Full Bench decision in Lakshmi Dass v. Roop Laul (8) (which is binding on me sitting in a Division Bench) should not, in my opinion, be extended so as to enable a defendant to raise an equitable defence, if the Court before which it is raised would not have jurisdiction to entertain a suit if brought by the defendant to obtain the relief of cancellation based on the right put forward as the basis of the equitable defence. Such an equitable defence may be successfully pleaded in some cases, even though a suit to obtain the relief based on the facts on which the defence is based may be barred by limitation, but I do not think that where the right to grant such a relief is, by statute law, vested in a special tribunal, the defence could be pleaded before another tribunal not vested with such power. I therefore agree with my learned brother that a transfer falling under S. 36, Provincial Insolvency Act, remains valid till set aside by the insolvent Court at the instance of the receiver and that the voidability of the transfer could not be pleaded as a defence in any Court till it is so set aside. I might further add that in this case there is nothing to show that the receiver Gopala Ayyar knew of the transfer and elected to avoid it. It is the Receiver alone that could so elect and not a purchaser from him. Hence, assuming that an order of annulment by the Court at the receiver's instance is unnecessary and that the receiver's unilateral declaration of intention to avoid will suffice, there is nothing to indicate that even such a declaration of intention existed in this case. The receiver's act of selling the property to defendant 3 is no proof of such intention in the absence of evidence that the receiver had even knowledge of the alienation to the plaintiff. A man cannot intend to destroy a thing of whose existence he is unaware.

I do not wish to enter upon a consideration of the difficult question whether the Full Bench decision in Lakshmi Doss v. Roop Laul (8) can be reconciled with the principle of the recent Full Bench decision in Subramani Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (10), in which it was held that a defendant cannot set up the voidability under S. 53, T. P. Act, of an alienation made in the plaintiff's favour in fraud of creditors till such alienation is set aside actually by a decree passed in a regular suit, especially in view of even more recent decisions which held that even a single creditor could maintain such a suit brought in his own individual interest and not necessarily on behalf of all the creditors.

Civil Appeal No. 390 of 1917, Decided on 16th January 1919, from decree of Sub-Judge, Tuticorin, in O. S. 70 of 1916.

(a) Interest Act (32 of 1898)—Act is not exhaustive—Interest can be awarded in cases not coming under Act.

The Interest Act is not exhaustive of all claims as to interest and it is open to the Courts in India to award interest in cases not coming within the purview of the Act, on principles of equity, justice and good conscience. [P 164 C 2]

(b) Interest Act (32 of 1898)—Act does not apply to unascertained sums of profits of trade.

To attract the provisions of the Interest Act the amount in dispute must be a debt or a certain sum payable at a certain time or otherwise. It has no application to an unascertained sum claimed as the profits of a trade. [P 165 C 1]

(c) Interest—Minor Mahomedan suing for her father's share in family trade against her coheirs, who used assets in another trade, is entitled to 6 p. c. interest on her share from father's death.

Where a Mahomedan minor sued for the recovery of her deceased father's share in a family trade, which was utilized by her coheirs in a separate business from which they derived a profit:

Held: that the plaintiff was entitled to interest on her share at the ordinary current rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date of her father's death: 29 I. C. 275, Dist.; London, Chatham and Dover Railway Company v. South Eastern Railway Company (1893) A. C. 429, Expl. [P 166 C 1]

S. Srinivasa Ayyangar—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This is a suit by a Mahommedan cosharer for recovery of her share of her father's property from her brothers and sisters. The right of the plaintiff, who was a minor, to sue was denied in the Court below but has not been pressed before us. The only two points which Mr. T. Rangachariar argued were: (1) whether the plaintiff is entitled to mesne profits of the immovable property, and (2) whether she is entitled to interest upon her share of the assets of the partnership carried on by her father. On the first question it was pointed out to us that in the Court below there was no allegation that mesne profits were not payable. There is no issue upon the point, and there is no discussion in the judgment of the Court below about it. Issue 6 assumes that the plaintiff was entitled to mesne profits and only raises the question of the deductions claimed by the defendants in their written statement. Under these circumstances we refused to allow the learned vakil to argue that point before us.

The second question has been argued elaborately by Mr. T. Rangachariar for the appellants and by the learned Advocate-General for the respondents. We have come to the conclusion that the decree of the Court below is right, though not for the reasons given by it. It is clear from the admissions in the written statement and from the evidence in the evidence in the case that the share of the plaintiff in the firm's assets was utilized by defendants 1 and 2 in the trade carried on by them and that profits were derived from that trade; the amount of profits alone had not been ascertained. The learned vakil for the appellant relied upon Kamalammal v. Peeru Meera (1), Subramania Aiyar v. Subramania Aiyar (2) and Lala Kalyan Das v. Sheikh Maqbul Ahmad (3) and the earlier Madras cases and contended that, as no notice of demand was made, no interest was allowable under Act 32 of 1839. All of them were cases under the Act. In the first place it must be pointed out that the Interest Act is not comprehensive of all claims to interest. Without going into details, it may be mentioned that the object of 3 and 4 William 4, Ch. 42, S. 28, which was extended to India by Act 32 of 1839, was to repeal the usury laws relating to interest. Prior to the enactment of 3 and 4 William IV, there was a law in the reign of Edward the Confessor which absolutely prohibited Courts from awarding interest in suits upon moneys lent. Attempts were made in the reign of Henry VII to mitigate the rigour of this prohibition, 3 and 4 William 4, Ch. 42, was enacted with a view to meet such a demand. It is clear from the language of the Act that the provisions dealt with only a particular class of cases, and enabled the Courts to give interest at the current rate under certain conditions. The framers were anxious that the right to interest, if any, otherwise possessed should not be interfered with by this enactment, and inserted the proviso to the effect that interest shall be payable "in all cases in which it is now payable by law." In India also ancient texts can be quoted to show that there was a prohibition against the taking of interest on moneys lent. One text of Manu exemplifies the abhorrence felt by the ancient sages on this question. Manu stated:

"Neither a Brahmin nor a Kshatria, though distressed, must receive interest on loans, but each of them, if he please, may pay a small interest permitted by law, on borrowing for some pious use, to the sinful man who demands it. See Colebrooke's Digest, p. 28.

It looks as if when 3 and 4 William 4 was extended to India, these provisions contained in the Hindu law were kept in mind. It is therefore clear that the Interest Act is not exhaustive of the subject.

There is another difficulty in the way of applying the Interest Act to the present case. To attract its provisions the amount in dispute must be a debt or a certain sum payable at a certain time or otherwise. What is claimed now is a sum of money which, on taking accounts, would be payable to the plaintiff as her share. It was held in Omrita Nath Mitter v. Admintstrator-General of Bengal (4) that unless the amount is settled the Act is not applicable. In London, Chatham and Dover Ry. Co. v. South-Eastern Railway Company (5) a claim to payment under a building contract to be paid monthly on the certificate of the engineer was held not to be a debt or a sum certain if the amount was disputed. see also Hill v. South Staffordshire Ry. (6). In Ward v. Eyre (7) it was held that a balance of account is not a sum certain within 3 and 4 William 4, Ch. 42. The Calcutta High Court in Rutnessur Biswas v. Hurish Chunder Bose (8) acted on the same principle. Therefore the Interest Act has no application to the case before us, and consequently the decisions relied on by the learned vakil for the appellant have no bearing on the matter we have to decide. On the other hand, the cases to which the learned Advocate-General drew our attention establish that the Act was not intended to affect payments of interest or compensation in matters not coming strictly within the letter of the law.

In Miller v. Barlow (9) the Judicial Committee point out that Indian Courts are Courts both of law and of equity and that they can award as damages interest not covered by the Act. In Hurropersaud Roy v. Shamapersaud Roy (10) a similar principle was enunciated by the Judcial Committee. In Hamira Bibi v. Zubaida Bibi (11), which was a case of dower, the Judicial Committee, after saying that the Interest Act was not applicable, allowed interest as damages. see also Ahmed Musaji Saleji v. Hashim Ebrahim Saleji (12) another decision of the Judicial Committee. There are decisions of the High Courts in which interest was allowed apart from the Act: Alagappa Chettiar v. Muthukumara Chettiar (13), Abdul Rahiman v. Rangiah Gounden (14), Khetra Mohan Poddar v. Aswini Kumar Saha (15), Mohamaya Prosad Singh v. Ram Khelawan Singh (16), Chajmal Das v. Brij Bhukan Lal (17) and Collector of Ahmedabad v. Lavji Mulji (18). Mr. Rangachariar contended that the above cases proceeded upon the principle that there was an established practice as to interest regarding the matter dealt with in them, and that the principle should not be extended to the case of a Mahomedan lady claiming interest on an unascertained sum of money due to her as her share of the trade. We fail to see any difference in principle between the cases to which we have referred and to the case now before us. The only decision which supports

Mr. Rangachariar is Marian Beeviammal v. Madir Keera Sahib Taragan (6).

In that case there has been no discussion on the question and the reference to the earning of interest shows that the decision should be confined to the facts of the case. The learned vakil for the appellant relied very strongly upon the observations of the noble and learned Lords in London, Chatham and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company (7) for the proposition that in matters outside the Interest Act no interest is payable. The noble Lords who took part in the discussion, especially Lord Herschell, point out that there has been a course of decisions in England which tried the hands of Courts from awarding interest on equitable grounds; and they regretted that they were obliged on the principle of stare decisis to decline to reopen the question. There is no such course of decisions in this country. On the other hand the Privy Council held very early that on principles of equity, justice and good conscience, which are specially referred to in the Civil Courts Act, the Courts in India are at liberty to award interest in cases not coming within the purview of the Interest Act. The Indian Courts have followed this rule for a long time. The Courts in this country therefore are not hampered in the exercise of their equity jurisdiction in the same way that English Courts have been.

It is not necessary therefore to refer to another argument of the learned Advocate-General which rested the claim to interest upon the existence of a quasi-fiduciary relationship between the plaintiff and her brothers. We think the Subordinate Judge is right in allowing interest. But, in our opinion, he ought not to have allowed more than 6 per cent. The current rate of interest in this country is ordinarily that, and no special reason has been shown why it should be raised to 9 per cent. The analogy of the Trusts Act, S. 23, to which the learned Advocate-General referred us, has no bearing on the present question and we are not prepared to allow compound interest at 6 per cent. The interest allowed will be reduced to 6 per cent throughout. Subject to this modification we dismiss the appeal with costs.

Criminal Revn. Case No. 714 of 1918, and Criminal Revn. Petn. No. 577 of 1918, D/- 10th April 1919, to revise order of Subdivisional Magistrate, Bezwada, in Misc. Case No. 14 of 1918.

(a) Criminal P. C. (5 of 1898), Ss. 145, 148 and 439—Final order based on evidence partly recorded by 1st Class Magistrate and partly by subordinate Magistrate under his directions is not bad and cannot be interfered in revision.

Where a 1st Class Magistrate passes a final order under S. 148, on evidence partly recorded by a Subordinate Magistrate under his directions and partly recorded by himself, he cannot be deemed to have acted without jurisdiction so as to call for interference by the High Court in revision. (b) Criminal P. C. (5 of 1898), S. 145—Likelihood of breach of peace is sufficient to vest jurisdiction.

The essential requisite to give a Magistrate jurisdiction under S. 145, is that he must be satisfied that a dispute exists likely to cause a breach of the peace concerning land or water or the boundaries thereof. Once he is so satisfied, his jurisdiction is complete and his subsequent action must be considered in relation to procedure, not jurisdiction. [P 167 C 2]

(c) Criminal P. C. (5 of 1898), S. 145—Enquiry by subordinate Magistrate is not limited to inspection and report.

Order. — In this case the Subdivisional Magistrate passed a preliminary order under S. 145 (1), Criminal P. C. He then passed proceedings directing the Sub-Magistrate of Tiruvur to hold a local inquiry, record evidence on both sides as to possession and submit his report with the records. The Sub-Magistrate examined 24 witnesses, exhibited a number of documents and submitted his report with the records. The Subdivisional Magistrate examined 8 more witnesses himself and then passed orders on all the evidence thus recorded by himself and the Sub-Magistrate, declaring one party to be in possession. It is argued (1) that the Subdivisonal Magistrate's action in directing the Sub-Magistrate to take evidence was not authorised by S. 148, and that he was not entitled to consider the evidence so recorded, (?) that this action rendered the final order passed by him void, as being without jurisdiction. For both propositions reliance is placed on the judgement of Wallis, J., in Arumuga Gounden v. Venkata Subbier (1), which certainly seems to support them. The true scope of S. 148, Criminal P. C., seems to me to be a very doubtful matter, and if it were necessary for this case to determine it, I should feel constrained to refer the case for the decision of a Division Bench. The question does not appear to have been seriously argued before the learned Judge in Arumaga Gounden v. Venkata Subbier (1) and he contents himself with quoting three earlier rulings [Baikunt Kuar, In re (2), Hanumanthappa v. Hussain Saib (3) and High Court Proceedings, 13*th November* 1868 No. 1492 (4).] In the former case Prinsep, J., certainly says that the local enquiry "should be restricted solely to some question relating to the feature of property about which the dispute has arisen, and that it should not be directed to any matter which can be proved before the Magistrate by oral evidence such as the question of actual possession."

This dictum seems to intirely ignore the very wide definition of "inquiry" in S. 4 (k), Criminal P. C.; and I may add that if it were the intention of the legislature to make the inquiry a mere "inspection" as the learned Judge seems to think, it would have been quite easy to say so. The two Madras cases merely lay down that it is not open to the Subdivisional Magistrate to depute the whole investigation to the Sub-Magistrate and to decline to receive any evidence himself, as he is bound to do under S. 145 (4). But assuming that the Subdivisional Magistrate's action in proceeding partially on evidence recorded under his order by a Subordinate Magistrate and not by himself is irregular, I am clearly of opinion that this does not effect his jurisdiction, or warrant the interference of this Court in revision. The whole question of the circumstances in which this Court would interfere with orders under S. 145, Criminal P. C., has been considered in Kamal Kutty v. Udayavarma Raja (5.) The judgment in that case (to which I was party) says p. 286 (of 36 Mad.):

"The essential requisite to give a Magistrate jurisdiction under S. 145, Criminal P. C., is that he must be satisfied from information of some sort that a dispute exists likely to cause a breach of the peace concerning land or water or the boundaries thereof in his jurisdiction. Once he is so satisfied, his jurisdiction is complete and his subsequent action must be considered in relation to procedure, not jurisdiction".

This ruling, so far as I am aware, has not been subsequently questioned and with all respect to the view expressed in Arumuga Gounden v. Venkata Subbier (1), I must follow it, especially as I see no reason to alter my opinion. I must therefore dismiss the present revision petition.

Judgment.—The question in this appeal is whether, after the making of an order of adjudication under S. 16, Provincial Insolvency Act, 1907, a creditor of the insolvent is prevented by the provisions of sub S. (2) (b) of that section from suing under S. 53, T. P. Act, to set aside a transfer made by the insolvent without first obtaining the leave of the Court. There appears to be a curious absence of authority as to the effect of the corresponding provision in the English Bankruptcy Acts with respect to actions by creditors under the Statute of Elizabeth, which corresponds with

S. 53, T. P. Act. The nature of the suit under the English and Indian Acts has recently been discussed in this Court in Palaniandi Chetti v. Appavu Chettiar (1), Subramania Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2) and Kottarathil Puthiyapurayil Pokker v. Balathil Parkum Chandrankandi Kunhamad (3). It appears that in England, while such a suit should ordinarily be on behalf of all the creditors and the decree should declare the transfer void against all of them, a judgment-creditor may sue in respect of his own debt alone and obtain satisfaction for it. The subsection of this Act provides that

"except as provided by the Act no creditor to whom the insolvent is indebted in respect of any debt provable under this Act shall, during the pendency of the insolvency proceedings, have any remedy against the property or person of the insolvent in respect of the debt or commence any suit or other legal proceeding, except with the leave of the Court and on such terms as the Court may impose."

A suit by a judgment creditor, such as I have mentioned, without the leave of the Court would, I think be in contravention of this section, and would enable the judgment-creditor to obtain satisfaction of his decree out of the property declared in the suit to be the property of the insolvent. Even as regards a suit by a creditor who was not a judgment-creditor to declare a transfer void against creditors generally, I think the words of the subsection "or commence any suit or other legal proceeding" are sufficiently wide to cover a suit to make property available as the property of the judgment-debtor and to forbid the institution of such a suit as this without the leave of the Court. The policy of the law as disclosed in the section is to place the administration of the estate including the realization of assets under the control of the Court, and it would be opposed to this policy to allow a creditor to proceed with a suit of this kind except with the leave of the Court and on such terms as it might impose. We agree with the Subordinate Judge and dismiss the appeal with costs.

S. Parthasarathy Aiyar— for Appellants.

K. Rajah Aiyar—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.— I entirely agree with the judgment of the learned Chief Justice and will only shortly give my reasons for the conclusion I have arrived at. The plaintiffs obtained a lease for 17 years of a certain garden from the owner of the property, defendant 1 in the suit. The document provides that the plaintiffs are to discharge a prior encumbrance to the extent of Rs. 2,805 besides making two other small payments. They failed to discharge the encumbrance, and the mortgagee, whose debt they had bound themselves to discharge, brought a suit to enforce the mortgage and obtained a decree. In the meantime, while the suit was pending, defendant 1 granted a usufructuary mortgage to defendants 4 to 7 and with the money so realized the mortgage decree was paid off. The Subordinate Judge in the Court of trial held that, since the plaintiffs failed to pay the amount stipulated for in this document, they were not entitled to possession of the properties, which was their chief prayer in the plaint. On appeal to this Court, the learned Chief Justice was of opinion that the fact that the plaintiffs had not paid the amount mentioned in the lease, was no answer to their suit for possession; while Kumaraswami Sastri, J., the other learned Judge who heard the appeal, disagreed and confirmed the decree of the Subordinate Judge.

On behalf of the respondents Mr. K. Rajah Aiyar, sough first of all to argue that the document in question, Ex. L, was not a lease at all, but a mere contract with respect to the future produce of certain trees. In the first place, this was not their case, up till now, and the written statement itself proceeds on the assumption that Ex. L is a lease. No doubt it is called a contract relating to coffee and plantain produce. But that description is not ipso facto conclusive. We find that the document goes on to state

"I have granted to you on lease the coffee, plantain, and jack produce belonging to me."

Further it says:

"You shall enjoy according to your choice the coffee, plantain and jack produce * * * * for 17 years from this date and on the expiry of the term, surrender the lands to me without any objection whatsoever. The assessment due for this land shall be paid by me;"

then it gives the boundaries of the land. There can be no doubt whatever that what the parties contemplated was a lease. We have got all the apt words of a conveyance by way of a lease. There would be no sense in talking about surrendering the lands, if it was only the future produce of certain trees apart from any interest in the land that was meant to be granted. Proceeding on that basis, there cannot be any doubt to my mind upou the authorities that the lessee is entitled to possession of the land demised to him, even though he has not paid the premium he bound himself to pay. This is an agricultural lease and therefore the Transfer of Property Act, in its terms does not apply. But the Transfer of Property Act, when it defines a lease of immovable property by S. 105, gives a definition which is undoubtedly applicable to agricultural leases as well in this country. Mr. Rajah Aiyar did not attempt to argue that the definition of a lease as contained in S. 105 is not applicable to agricultural leases. S. 105 says:

"A lease of immovable property is a transfer of a right to enjoy such property etc."

Now S. 108 lays down the rights and liabilities of the lessor and the lessee. Cl. (b) of that section provides that "the lessor is bound on the lessee's request to put him in possession of the property," and Cl. (l) says that

"the lessee is bound to pay or tender at the proper time and place, the premium or rent to the lessor or his agent in this behalf."

And it is argued that this is a case of reciprocal contracts, and that the lessor is only bound to put the lessee in possession after the lessee has paid or is prepared to pay the premium that is agreed upon. This, to my mind, proceeds entirely on a misconception of the true nature of a lease and of the rights of the parties arising from such a transaction. It is not a mere contract; it is a transfer of a right to enjoy the property. That means it is a transfer of an interest in immovable property, and S. 108 assumes it is a transfer of such an interest. The right of the lessee to be put into possession arises from the words of the demise which imply that the right to possession is granted to the lessee, and the lessor is not entitled to refuse to give possession to the lessee unless the document provides that the latter is not to have possession until the fulfilment of a certain condition. It is found by both the Courts that no such condition exists in this case. No doubt there are also other rights and liabilities, both of the lessor and the lessee, which are set out in S. 108, T. P. Act, and which arise out of the general law governing the relations of landlord and tenant. The liability of the lessor to put the lessee in possession may be said to arise out of the implied covenant applying to leases, as put by my learned brother, Coutts-Trotter, J., in Secy. of State v. Pemmaraju Venkayya Garu (1). The distinction between executory and executed contracts is well known, as pointed out in Wolverhampton and Walshall Railway v. L. & N. W. Ry. (2). A lease is an executed contract; it is a transfer of property or of an interest in property; and all the considerations which apply to the enforcement of mere contracts do not necessarily apply to a transfer.

We have been referred to a number of cases, both of this Court and other Courts in which it is laid down that a vendee of immovable property is entitled to possession of the property even though he has not paid the consideration mentioned in the deed of sale: see for instance Velayutha Chetty v. Govindasami Naicker (3), Velayutha Chetty v. Govindaswami Naiken (4), and Govindammal v. Gopalachariar (5) and this proposition Mr. Rajah Aiyar has not contested before us. But he says there is a distinction between a sale and a lease. His argument is that a lease for a term stands on no higher footing than a mere contract, and he has referred us for this position to the English law. In English law no doubt a lease for a term is a mere chattel interest and has been treated as such in some of the cases, for instance by Chitty, J., in Wallis v. Hands (6). But he has not been able to cite any Indian cases to show that these technical distinctions of English law between real and chattel interest in land obtain in India. Speaking for myself, I am not aware that the peculiarities of English law as regards leases for a term have ever been adopted in this country. The law regarding real property in India is, in many respects very different from that of England, and it is especially so regarding leases; for instance Indian law recognizes leases in perpetuity which are unknown to the English law, though it recognizes leases for such terms as for 99 years or 999 years. And I do not think I should be justified in importing the technicalities of English law relating to leases for terms into this country.

Mr. Rajah Aiyar's main argument has been that there is some sort of equity in his clients' favour and therefore we ought to deny the plaintiffs the remedy which they seek, viz., recovery of possession. What the plaintiffs seek is a remedy in law, and their rights to possession cannot be defeated by pleading laches or any other considerations of that kind which might be effective if the suit was one for some relief in equity. Reliance was placed on S. 39, Contract Act 9 of 1872. But this is not a case for enforcement of a contract. The plaintiffs' right to possession arises out of the interest which they have acquired in the land and the doctrine regarding mutual promises has therefore no application. Then we have also been referred to S. 35, Specific Relief Act, which deals with recission of contracts on grounds of misrepresentation, fraud and the like. Our attention was specially drawn to the illustrations which speak of rescission of sale and other transfers on the ground mentioned in the section. But the section deals with cases in which the contract is vitiated by reason of misrepresentation or fraud, and, if the contract which led to the transfer is voidable, that is, liable to be set aside, the transfer based upon it necessarily fails. But the plea of the respondents in this case is based, not upon anything which would make the contract relating to the lease liable to be set aside, but on something which happened after the grant of the lease, viz., nonpayment of a certain sum of money mentioned in the lease. S. 35, Specific Relief Act, has no application.

Reliance has been placed on two decisions, one of the Allahabad High Court in Chhotku Rai v. Baldeo Shukul (7); and another of this Court, in Subba Rau v. Devu Shetti (8), the former is referred to by Kumaraswami Sastri, J., in his judgment. In the Allahabad case, certain property was mortgaged and only a portion of the mortgage amount was paid. The mortgagor sold the mortgaged property and his assignees sued for redemption of the mortgage, before the expiry of the term of the mortgage, and it was held on equitable grounds that the plaintiffs should be allowed to redeem before the expiry of the specified term. The learned Judges do not however lay down any general principles of law which I should feel justified in adopting and applying to this case; all that they say is, that "the defendants not having performed what we deemed to be a most essential part of the contract so far as they are concerned, the plaintiffs ought to be allowed to redeem the property before the expiration of ten years."

They cite no authority and do not enunciate any general and well-recognized principle of equity by which the case could be said to be governed. With all respect to the learned Judges, it is not open to us to proceed on some sort of vague equitable grounds, especially in a case like this, where the plaintiffs are seeking a remedy in law. As regards Subba Rau v. Devu Shetti (8) one of the learned Judges, Muthuswami Aiyar, J., says in his judgment :

" Upon the facts found the Subordinate Judge obviously considered the original mortgage as lawfully cancelled."

The facts of that case are not to be found in the report and it is not clear how the instrument came to be cancelled. I do not think that the judgment can be said to lay down any general proposition that can be applied to the present case. I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned Chief Justice is right. It was noticed during the course of the argument that the learned Chief Justice gave a decree to the plaintiffs on condition of their paying the prior mortgage and that respondents 4 to 7 were entitled to retain possession until they have been repaid. But the form of the decree has not been challenged before us by the learned pleader for the appellants. The result therefore will be that the judgment of Kumaraswami Sastri, J., is set aside and there will be a decree in favour of the plaintiffs to the effect that they will be entitled to possession of the property on paying the money due under the mortgage decree in Original Suit No. 87 of 1912, and until then respondents 4 to 7 will remain in possession. The appellants are entitled to their costs throughout.

Oldfield, J.—I agree.

Coutts-Trotter, J.—I agree and wish to add only a few words. The appellants (plaintiffs) were lessees under a deed of lease and I have no doubt that the deed of lease was a present demise and nothing else. As long ago as the case of Holder v. Taylor (9), which was decided in the beginning of the 17th century, it was laid down that the word " demise " in a lease involves by necessary implication a covenant or contract or call it what you will on behalf of the lessor to give instantaneous and complete possession to the lessee. In this case, the lessor was under an obligation to give possession to the lessees. Certain other obligations were cast on the lessees by the instrument of lease, and among them was an obligation to discharge an existing encumbrance by the payment of certain sums of money. The plaintiffs failed to do that. They broke their obligation to pay off this encumbrance and the result was that respondents 4 to 7 in this case stepped into the breach, paid off the old encumbrancer and took from the owners of the land a usufructuary mortgage. The mortgage paid off was not a usufructuary mortgage but a simple hypothecation without rights of possession The question is whether respondents 4 to 7 can be allowed to plead their usufructuary mortgage in derogation of the right claimed by the plaintiffs. Now, as I understand it, you can defeat the right to possession under a lease in various ways. If it is only an agreement for a lease all sorts of equitable pleas are open by way of reply to an action for specific performance, and any breach of contract by the person seeking to enforce the contract, and any breach by him of any of the provisions of the contract, might be a very excellent answer to his suit for specific performance. If it is a demise, you can show that there was a condition precedent to its taking effect as such. That is just what was attempted to be done in this case. That defence broke down and it was held that the obligations of the lessees were not conditions precedent, but were merely mutual concurrent contracts or covenants between lessor and lessee. Or you can show that the whole thing is void, because the making of the contract was vitiated by fraud, coercion or misapprehension.

That is not this case, and no such ground is suggested.. What is the result? The result is that the respondents are seeking to destroy the right to possession given by the instrument by setting up a breach of contract which arose subsequent to the obligation to give possession. That seems to be an obviously impossible defence. It is for the safeguarding of those rights of a lessor that covenants of re-entry are inserted in leases, whereby a breach of contract by the lessee subsequent to the lease may entitle the lessor to re-enter and get back possession of the land. But, in my opinion, that must be under a specific covenant of re-entry in the lease. If there is no such clause, there can be no right to get back possession of the land. If S. 39, Contract Act, applies, this document is not a transfer of property or of any interest in the land but is a mere bundle of mutual obligations under a contract. I think much confusion has arisen from the fact that the English law of real property makes a very sharp distinction between those rights over property which are termed "real" rights and "chattel" interest in property which are mere personal rights.

I think that is a peculiar incident of the English law of property with its very curious history, and it seems to me that it is not necessary to complicate Indian law by seeking to import such technicalities of English law into India. In the case reported as Secy. of State v. Pemmaraju Venkayya Garu (1), I took very great care in deciding the question of the leasehold interest which then came up, not to base my judgment on technicalities peculiar to English real property law but on general principles which seemed to me to apply. I think that the introduction of the English conception of chattel interests in land might lead to the conclusion that nothing had passed by way of transfer, that there was a mere bundle of rights and that S. 39, Contract Act, applied. To my mind that could be arrived at only by importing the English doctrine and, speaking for myself, I must decline to adopt that course.

That being so, I regard this instrument not as a mere executory contract but as a transfer of an estate. S. 39, Contract Act, in my opinion, applies only to a state of things where there is a series of executory promises on both sides; and so soon as one part of the obligation has been performed by a complete transfer of the property in question, that section ceases to have any application. As regards the decision reported as Chhotku Rai v. Baldeo Shukul (7), all I can say is that I do not understand it as reported, nor do I gather upon what principle the learned Judges proceeded. With regard to the case in Subba Rau v. Devu Shetti (8), I have no hesitation in saying that unless it can be explained by an omission in the report as to the existence of an express power of cancellation, it must be regarded as contrary to the trend of authority. I think that the order of the learned Chief Justice is right. It may be that the appellants might have got further relief. But they have contented themselves with the Chief Justice's judgment.

Judgment.— Two Mahomedan brothers, Sanjiappa Rowthan and Sheik Muhammad Rowthan, acquired considerable properties. Sheik Muhammad died in 1894 and Sanjippa Rowthan in 1901. The three plaintiffs are the widow, the son and daughter respectively of Sanjiappa. Defendants 2 and 3, are the widow and daughter of Shiek Muhammad. Defendant 1 is the husband of defendant 3.

The case for the plaintiffs is that after the death of Sanjippa Rowthan the properties were entrusted to the management of defendant 1, on behalf of the members of the Mahomedan family, that during the management, defendant 1 misappropriated the properties, that thereupon certain mediators interceded and obtained the transfer of some of the properties to the plaintiffs and that defendant 1 is still retaining money belonging to the plaintiffs. Defendant 1 denied his agency and his liability to account. The Subordinate Judge in an unnecessarily long judgment has come to the conclusion that defendant 1 managed the properties honestly until 1909, that since then he had not been discharging his duties properly, and that therefore he should be held accountable for money received by him since 1909. Defendant 1 and the plaintiffs have filed a memorandum of objections.

The legal position of defendant 1 has not been correctly appreciated in the Court below. We are satisfied that defendant 1 was asked to manage the properties belonging to the share of Sheik Muhammad. We do not agree with Mr. K. V. Krishaswami Ayyar that unless there is direct evidence of an appointment as agent, defendant 1 cannot be held liable; but the agency which is inferable from the course of conduct pursued by plaintiff 1 and defendant 1 cannot affect plaintiffs 2 and 3. It is now well settled in this Presidency that a Mahomedan mother is not the de jure guardian of her children: Hyderman Kutti v. Syed Ali (1). Consequently defendant 1 could not have been appointed either expressly or impliedly by plaintiff 1 to be the agent for the management of the properties of plaintiffs 2 and 3. The position occupied by defendant 1 must under the circumstances be taken to be as agent of plaintiff 1 and as administrator de son tort of the properties of plaintiffs 2 and 3. This being the legal relationship of the parties the question now for consideration is whether the claim for an account has become barred either wholly or in part. There can be no doubt that an administrator de son tort is not responsible as an agent to render an account. He is only responsible to refund money which he has received on behalf of the estate. See William's Law of Executors and Administrators, Vol. 1, p. 190; see also the observations in Stevens, In re, Cooke v. Stevens (2). Consequently defendant 1 is bound to restore to plaintiffs 2 and 3 all the money received by him from their estate. The estate consists of two classes of property: one consisting of lands which are in the possession of cultivating raiyats, the other consisting of bonds for money borrowed from the estate. As regards the former the finding of the Subordinate Judge which is supported by the evidence is that until 1909 defendant 1 had not misappropriated or retained any money belonging to the share of the two minor plaintiffs. Therefore he is liable to plaintiffs 2 and 3 only for money received by him since 1909 and up to the beginning of 1911, when the decision of the arbitrators was given. As regards the latter class of property, apparently all the bonds, whether renewed in the name of defendant 1 or still standing in the name of the minor plaintiffs were handed over to the mediators in 1911. The mediators decided that if defendant 1 was guilty of laches in collecting the money on the bonds and had thereby allowed them to be barred by limitation, he should make good to the various plaintiffs the loss occasioned by his conduct. Therefore the liability of defendant 1 so far as the bonds are concerned is regulated by the decision of the arbitrators by Ex. 11, and not by his liability as administrator de son tort. The result will be that so far as the bonds are concerned, defendant 1 should be held liable only in respect of any time-barred debts between 1909 and 1911. After 1911 defendant 1 having severed his connexion with the management, any laches on the part of the two plaintiffs to collect money due to them should not be charged against him. The decree of the Subordinate Judge as far as plaintiffs 2 and 3 are concerned will be modified as indicated above.

As regards plaintiff 1, the Subordinate Judge says that her right of suit is not barred, because the claim of plaintiffs 2 and 3 is not barred by limitation. We are unable to agree with him. It is true that the decision in Ahinsa Bibi v. Abdul Kader Saheb (3) lends support to the view taken by the Subordinate Judge. But we fail to see how in a Mahomedan family where the heirs are entitled to definite shares as tenants-in-common, the the cause of action of such heirs can be said to be a joint one. In the case of plaintiff 1 she was a major and she entrusted defendant 1 with the management of her property. She has not brought the suit within three years of the termination of the agency; consequently her claim so far as the income from landed properties is concerned is barred by limitation. So far as her right to get her share of the time-barred debts for which under the award of the arbitrators defendant 1 was held responsible is concerned, her claim is saved by Ex. 2. The decree in favour of plaintiff 1 can only be for the loss occasioned to her in respect of the bonds items 1 to 31 mentioned in the plaint schedule. As regards the memorandum of objections, in the view we have taken of the legal relationship of the parties, the claim on behalf of plaintiff 1 and of the other plaintiffs is unsustainable. That is dismissed with costs. In the appeal parties will pay and receive proportionate costs.

T. V. Muthukrishna Ayyar and S. E. Sankara Ayyar—for Respondents.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—Defendant 2 is the appellant. He purchased the plaint house from defendant 1, who is the plaintiff's father. The plaintiff is the son of defendant 1 by defendant 1's deceased first wife. Defendant 1 made a gift of the house in November 1903 to his first wife (that is plaintiff's mother) by Ex. 1. The plaintiff was born after the date of the gift deed and he claims the property as the heir of his mother and seeks to recover possession of it from the purchaser, defendant 2, after declaring that the sale deed by defendant 1 in September 1908 in favour of defendant 2 is not binding on the plaintiff. The defendants' contentions were that the gift deed to plaintiff's mother was a nominal transaction which was never acted upon and that the sale to defendant 2, by defendant 1 acting for himself and as guardian of the plaintiff, was made for proper purposes binding on the plaintiff.

When this suit was brought the plaintiff was a minor and the suit was therefore brought by his next friend, his paternal aunt's husband. (It is clear from the written statements that defendants 1 and 2 have been acting together, defendant 1 having married a second wife). The plaintiff also claims mesne profits for 3 years before suit and the only defence so far as the claim is concerned is that the claim is excessive. In the first Court no contention was raised in dispute of the allegation in para. 6 of the plaint that an absolute interest in the plaint house had vested in Kuppammal under the gift deed. The learned District Munsif found that the gift deed was a real transaction and that the plaintiff's mother did enjoy the house with full rights. He found also that the sale deed was not binding on the plaintiff as it was not executed for the advantage of the minor. In appeal a new contention seems to have been raised in the appeal memorandum that the deed Ex. 1, even if effective, gave the mother-in-law only a life interest and that the reversion came back to the plaintiff's father on plaintiff's mother's death. It does not however appear that this point was argued before the appellate Court, as no reference is made in the judgment of the learned District Judge to this contention. The contention however has been strongly pressed before us in second appeal and I shall at once deal with that contention. Ex. 1 states that the husband who is contemplating retirement from the world and pilgrimage to holy shrines, makes a gift of the suit house to his childless wife in lieu of her maintenance. A husband is bound to make provision for the maintenance of his wife before retirement from temporal affairs and that obligation is evidently intended to be discharged by this gift. Under the deed the donor gives the house "with its site, water-courses, treasures and stones" with power of alienation by sale expressly conferred on the donee and recites that he gives also possession of the title-deeds. Construing this document in its ordinary sense according to the plain meaning of the language, I can find no difficulty whatever in arriving at the conclusion that it conferred an absolute heritable interest on the donee. It was however argued by Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastriar, on the strength of some judicial observations in the decisions he has quoted, that because the gift was made to a Hindu woman, more especially to a wife, we must construe the document restrictively having regard to the supposed intention of a person who makes a gift to a Hindu woman not to give her more than a life-interest. I shall refer to a few of those cases. The first case referred to is the decision of the Privy Council in Moulvie Mohamed Shumsool Hooda v. Shewukram (1). The facts and the course of decision in that case were rather peculiar. The document in that case was a disposition in favour of his daughter-in-law by a testator. He made her the heir and malik of his properties after his death. Then he said that her daughters shall be her heirs. There were no words of inheritance (such as putra poutradi) in the document and no powers of alienation were expressly conferred.

That document had been construed by Bayley and Hobhouse, JJ., in Chutter Lall Singh v. Shewuk Ram (2) as granting an absolute heritable estate to the daughter-in-law, where the learned Judges had to construe it in the first of the two suits in which the document had to be construed. In the later suit the decision of the High Court which is reported in the foot-note [see Syad Mahomed Shumsal Hoola v. Shewakram (3)] to Srimati Pabitra Dasi v. Damudar Jana (4), that same document was construed by two out of three Judges as giving only a life interest to the daughter-in-law (D. K.) having regard to the notions of Hindus about the extent of women's interest in the property inherited by them, but the third Judge [who was one of the Judges who took part in the decision in Chutter Lail Singh v. Shewuk Ram (2)] dissented and he adhered to his former opinion. Then the case went up to the Privy Council and their Lordships, on the particular facts of that case and having regard to the surrounding circumstances, thought that the majority of the Judges in Srimati Pabitra Dasi v. Damudar Jana (4) came to the right conclusion on the construction of a rather difficult deed. The decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council seems to have been considered in several decisions of the High Courts as if it laid down the broad proposition that a gift to a Hindu female (and especially to a wife or widow by her husband) should be construed with a prejudice in favour of the view that only a life-interest was intended. I must say with the greatest respect that no such rule of law can be deduced from the said decision of the Privy Council. On the other hand so long ago as in 1875, a very learned Judge, Romesh Chunder Mitter, laid down in Kollany Kooer v. Luchmee Pershad (5) that he was not aware of any provision of Hindu law that a gift to a Hindu female means a limited gift or carries with it only a limited estate. Even as regards the wife the text of Narada quoted in Bhujanga Rau v. Ramayamma (6), what has been given by an affectionate husband to his wife she may consume as she pleases when he is dead or may give it away except the immovable property, does not in my opinion mean that a gift even of immovable property, if accompanied with express power of disposal, cannot confer an absolute estate on the wife—of course Narada was not considering the case of a disposition by will in favour of a widow to take effect after the testator's death.

In Bhujanga Rau v. Ramayamma (6) it was held that a gift with the words putra poutra paryantam added did not confer on the wife a power of alienation though the land became her stridhanam. With the greatest respect I am not prepared to assent to the correctness of that decision, which, in my opinion, requires reconsideration when the same question arises again. High Court, and Nanjamma v. Nacharammal (8) are concerned, the decisions rested upon particular words found in the deeds executed in favour of the female donee; in the one case that she should enjoy for her maintenance and in the other case that she could enjoy for her life. Their Lordships of the Privy Council have themselves indicated that they did not mean by their decision in Moulvie Mohamed Shumsool Hooda v. Shewukram (1), to lay down any such general rule as is contended for [see Jogeswar Narain Deo v. Ram Chandra Dutt (9)] where even the words indicating that the gift was for maintenance were not held to detract from the absolute character of the estate given by the deed; also Surajmoni v. Rabi Nath Ojha (10). In Vencataraju v. Kottayya (11) I ventured to express the opinion that a gift by a female thould not be construed less liberally than a gift to a male: see also Ramanuja Aiyangar v. Satagohacharar (12). As regards the case in Manika Mudali v. Muthachi Kavandan (13) I respectfully dissent from the opinion of Ayling, J., that the words "sarva swathanthrathudan" did not confer an absolute estate on the female donee. The other learned Judge, Tyabji, J., was inclined to differ but naturally felt too deffident to differ, especially as two Hindu Judges in the lower Courts had expressed a contrary opinion. The decision in Appeal No. 26 of 1896 decided by Subrahmania Ayyar and Benson, JJ., was sought to be distinguished by Ayling, J., on the ground that, besides the words "sarva swathanthrathudan" there were other expressions in the document construed in Appeal No. 26 of 1896 which indicated the intention to grant an absolute estate.

I venture to think that "with full proprietary powers" the meaning of sarva swathanthrathudan, is the strongest expression that an alienor can employ to confer an absolute estate on the alienee and that the addition of other expressions is superfluous. Mr. Venkatarama Sastri tried to make a point of the fact that only the power of sale was given in the document now construed and not the general power of alienation by sale, gift, etc., words usually found in documents intended to confer an absolute title. I am not much impressed with this argument. The grant of a power of sale, in my opinion, fully and sufficiently indicates the grant of an absolute estate. I therefore agree with the lower Courts in their construction of the document Ex. 1. A minor point was urged that because the father, defendant 1, had obtained interest for some time on behalf of himself and the plaintiff on the amount of a mortgage deed which defendant 2 executed for the greater portion of the purchase money mentioned in the sale deed executed to him by defendant 1, the plaintiff is not entitled to claim rent till the date of the document executed by defendant 1, acknowledging receipt of such interest. In the first place this point seems not to have been taken in the first Court, or even in the ground of appeal to the lower appellate Court. In the next place, the money was obtained by defendant 1, not for the benefit of the plaintiff who is the only person entitled to the mesne profits, but was obtained as interest on the amount of a mortgage bond which was a part of the course of transactions created by defendant 1 with intention of acting adversely to and creating evidence against the plaintiff's claim as heir of his mother. This contention therefore must also be overruled. In the result I would dismiss the second appeal with plaintiff's costs. The time for removing the superstructure allowed to defendant 2 is extended till the expiry of 4 months from this date.

Spencer, J.—I agree. On the somewhat belated contention, that the gift deed in this case, Ex. 1, which contains the words:

"I have gifted this day in lieu of maintenance the undermentioned house with rights of alienation by sale," confers on the wife only a life-estate, I wish to add a few words in deference to the very full arguments we have listened to. In Toolsi Dass Kurmokar v. Madan Gopal Day (14) it was laid down by Harrington, J., that one of the tests which may be applied to see whether the estate given is intended to be absolute or not, is to see whether the donee has a power of disposition over it. I respectfully agree with this and adopt this test. In Jogeswar Narain Deo v. Ram Chandra Dutt (9) the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has no hesitation in construing a gift deed which contained an express power given to the donees of making alienations by sale or gift as conveying an absolute estate. There were other words in the deed which led to the same conclusion. But the decision supports the view that where words giving powers of alienation or of absolute estate occur in the document, the ordinary implication is that the grant is an absolute one. Manika Mudali v. Muthachi Kavandan (13) was a decision which turned mainly on the meaning of the words sarva swathanthrathundan, which do not occur in the document before us. If in that case there had been a distinct provision for alienation, it is clear from Ayling, J.'s remarks that he would have come to the conclusion that an absolute estate was gifted. But in that case only the words sarva swathanthrathudan occurred and the power of sale that occurs in the document before us was not present in that document. In Annaji Dattatraya v. Chandrabai (7) there were no words giving expressly the power to alienate the property. In Nanjamma v. Nacharammal (8) the question that arose was whether there was a grant of a life estate or a widow's estate. The learned Judges held that what was given in that case was a life-estate, and they came to this conclusion on account of the words "you shall enjoy the same all your life." They commented on the absence of apt words for the purpose of clothing the widow with powers of alienation for purposes of family necessity, and they decided that the mere expression "with power to sell and give away" did not necessarily indicate the grant of a widow's estate. On the construction of the suit gift deed I agree with my learned brother that the District Judge was right in his opinion that an absolute estate passed and that the second appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—Defendant 3's husband, one Ramaswami Chetti, brought a suit in 1907 against defendants 1 and 2, who were the sons of his nephew, for partition. Defendant 2 was then a minor. Eventually, Ramaswami Chetty was allowed to withdraw the suit as against defendant 2 with liberty to bring another suit and the suit was compromised between him and defendant 1, and a decree was passed in terms of the compromise. Under this compromise defendant 1 took a certain share of the family property and separated himself from the family. This was on 17th November 1908. In 1912 defendant 1 sold certain properties which were the subject-matter of this suit to the plaintiff, these properties being certain properties which belonged to the family of Ramaswami Chetti and defendants 1 and 2, but which were alleged in the prior litigation by Ramaswami Chetti to have been dedicated to charity. The question we have to consider now is whether defendant 1, at the date of sale had any interest in the plaint properties. In the prior original suit, No. 80 of 1907, Ramaswami Chetti expressly mentioned these charity properties in his plaint, but said that, as definite arrangements had been made in the family for their management, it was unnecessary to obtain any relief in respect of them and therefore they were not included in the suit. Defendant 1 in his written statement no doubt asked that the plaintiff's suit should be dismissed, but in para. 24 he claimed that if there were a partition those charity properties should also be divided, and defendant 2, put forward a similar plea.

The razinamah does not specifically relate to these charity properties, but we are clear, after a careful consideration of its terms, that they also formed the subject-matter of the compromise. The razinamah begins with the following words: "Whatever may be the claims of us both," and we see from the plaint and written statements in that suit that a claim had been put forward in respect of the charity properties by the defendants, and the plaintiff had pleaded that they were not divisible. The razinamah then goes on to deal in detail with several of the contentions in defendant 1's written statement, and in respect of one of them it says in para. 6 that the dispute had already been settled, and finally para. 7 reads as follows:

"That the parties herein . . . have no right against one another in respect of property."

It is clear that there had been no prior settlement between them about the charity properties and it is equally clear that the compromise was in respect of all their claims, and amongst these claims must be included the claim of defendant 1 to share in the charity properties. We are therefore of opinion that the charity properties formed part of the subject-matter of the compromise. The next contention of the appellant is that, even if the charity properties were included in the compromise, they were not affected by the decree passed thereon, because the properties not forming the subject-matter of the suit, the compromise decree could not affect them.

As these properties were referred to in the plaint as being family properties though not divisible, and in the written statements an allegation was made that they were divisible before giving a decree for partition, it would have been necessary for the Court to decide the question of their partibility, and if it found that they were partible, these properties must necessarily have been included in the partition decree. In this respect they undoubtedly formed the subject-matter of the suit. The contention that no stamp duty had been paid specifically in respect of these properties is not of much importance, for, even if the decree had been given without stamp duty being paid, it would not invalidate the decree, and we see that in valuing partition suits it has been held by this Court that the valuation is to be according to the amount at which the relief sought is valued in the plaint: vide Boganadam Rangiah Chetty v. Boganadam Subramania Chetty (1). In this view of the matter, we must hold that the razinamah decree did deal with the charity properties and consequently it is unnecessary for the respondent to fall back upon the razinamah itself. It is therefore unnecessary to decide the objection taken by the appellant that the razinamah not being registered cannot have effect as against the immovable property.

The next objection urged against the razinamah decree is that it is a decree which could not have been passed in that suit and consequently is an absolute nullity. Reliance is placed on Lakshmana Chetti v. Chinnathambi Chetti (2) and Gobind Chandra Sardar v. Bhagabat Sardar (3). The case of Lakshmana Chetti v. Chinnathambi Chetti (2) however does not seem to be authority for such a broad proposition, for all that was decided there was that when parties to a partition suit had submitted to arbitration, the award made upon their submission could not be passed into a decree because there were some minors who were parties to the suit and leave of the Court had not been obtained under S. 462, Civil P. C., either before the submission to arbitration or after the award. The case of Gobind Chandra Sardar v. Bhagabat Sardar (3) is somewhat more in favour of the appellant, though it does not in terms say that such a decree is a nullity, for the decree in that case had been based on a compromise to which several of the defendants had not been parties, and it was held that it would not be binding upon them and that no decree ought to have been given in accordance with its terms and consequently the consent dercree was set aside by the order in that case. Although this is authority for saying that the consent decree was wrongly made, it does not appear to be any authority for holding that that decree was a nullity ab initio. In order that the decree should be a nullity, it must be one passed without jurisdiction. If the Court had jurisdiction, the fact that it passed a wrong order would not make its order a nullity. A Court has jurisdiction to decide wrong as well as right, and if it decides wrong, the wronged party can only take the course prescribed by law of setting matters right. In this case the Court has jurisdiction to try the partition suit, and whether it was right or wrong in passing the decree it did, it certainly had jurisdiction to do so. This question has been considered in Thuljaram Row v. Gopala Aiyan (4) and we agree with Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., that the

"true rule is that if the Court has jurisdiction to pass orders of a particular kind, that in a particular case it passed, an order which it should not have passed is not a case of total want of jurisdiction so as to render that order a nullity."

If the decree is not a nullity, it must be binding, at any rate, on defendant 1, and under that decree he gave up all his rights to the plaint property and was therefore unable to pass any title to the present plaintiff. Whether that decree is binding on defendant 2 who was not actually a party to it, the suit as against him having been withdrawn previously, need not, we think, be decided now. It is open to him to question it if he so wishes, but whether he can do so effectually when the managing member of his family effected a partition between defendant 1 and the other members of the family is a doubtful point which he can be left for determination when necessary. In the result the second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

ABDUR RAHIM AND OLDFIELD, JJ.

Veerappa Chetty — Defendant — Appellant.

v.

Vellayan Ambalam and others—Plaintiffs and Defendants—Respondents.

Civil Appeal No. 307 of 1917, Decided on 11th December 1918, against decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Sivaganga, in O. S. No. 117 of 1915.

(a) Negotiable Instruments Act (26 of 1881), Ss. 91 and 92—Bill of exchange payable at sight or demand—Dishonour by non-acceptance— Presentment for acceptance—Refusal to accept amounts to dishonour by non-payment—Notice is necessary.

In the case of a bill of exchange payable at sight or on demand there can be dishonour by non-acceptance, though the law does not require that, in the case of such bill, there should be a presentment for acceptance. But if the drawee of such a bill refuses to accept it, it practically amounts to a refusal to pay and becomes dishonour by non-payment. That is to say, there is nothing in law which precludes a bill payable on demand being presented for acceptance although that may not be necessary. In order however to sustain an action against the drawee, there must be dishonour and notice of dishonour given within reasonable time. [P 182 C 1, 2]

(b) Negotiable Instruments Act (26 of 1881), S. 119 — Presumption of dishonour arises on proof of protest—Certificate of protest is necessary.

Under S. 119 a Court is entitled to presume the fact of dishonour, but that is only so where there is a proper protest. No such presumption would arise from a mere entry by a notary public of the words "noted for non-payment" without giving the date of dishonour, and in the absence of a certificate of protest [P 180 C 2]

(c) Negotiable Instruments Act (26 of 1881), Ss. 91 and 92—Refusal to pay includes refusal to accept.

Per Oldfield, J.—The refusal to pay referred to in S. 92 includes a refusal to accept such as is contemplated in S. 91, which is a possible, though not an invariable or obligatory, preliminary to payment being demanded at all. [P 183 C 1]

(d) Negotiable Instruments Act (26 of 1881)—English Law.

The Negotiable Instruments Act should be read conformably to the provisions of the English law, which follows the general Commercial law of the rest of the world. [P 821 C 2]

L. A. Govindaraghava Ayyar and K. N. Kumaraswamy Ayyar—for Appellant.

R. Ganapathy Ayyar—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—The suit which we are dealing with in this appeal was instituted with respect to a Hundi drawn by defendant 1, the appellant, on S. R. M. S. Ranganathan Chetty in Rangoon in favour of defendant 2, who assigned it to defendant 3 and defendant 3 assigned it to defendant 4's father, who assigned it to the plaintiff. Several defences were raised but we need not deal with all of them. We wish to deal with the questions of fact whether there was presentment of the Hundi and in due time, whether there was dishonour and notice of dishonour, if any, given to the drawer as required by law. The question whether the Hundi was discharged by payment has also been argued before us.

The learned Advocate-General has also raised a rather interesting question of law based on the provisions of Ss. 61 and 74, Negotiable Instruments Act, read with Ss. 91, 92, 93 and 94. The case cannot be said to have been tried as satisfactorily as it might have been, but we have to come to a conclusion upon the evidence on record. The whole evidence regarding presentment and dishonour and the alleged discharge is of a very unsatisfactory kind. No witness from the firm of the drawer was examined in support of the case of the plaintiff as to presentment and no explanation is forthcoming for this omission. Nor has there been any attempt to produce the books of that firm which, it is likely, would have contained some record as to the fact of presentment of this bill if it was actually presented as is spoken to by P. W. 2. The bill is alleged to have been sent at the request of defendant 4's father by a firm in Madura, called V. E. R. M. Firm, for collection. One of the men from that firm, the son of the proprietor, was examined as P. W. 5. He says that he received a letter saying that the bill had been presented for payment and that it was dishonoured. But no attempt was made to produce that letter, nor has any book of account or anything in writing been produced in support of the plaintiff's allegation. It was quite easy for the plaintiff to produce absolutely conclusive evidence on this point.

It was argued by the learned Advocate-General that we ought to accept the evidence given by the plaintiff even though it is not the best evidence available, and such as it is, is unsatisfactory because the probabilities of the case, he contends, show that the allegations of the plaintiff are true. But the transaction to say the least was of very peculiar character. We do not find any proper explanation for the fact that although the bill was presented some time in May or June 1913, if the evidence of the plaintiff is to be accepted on that point, it was noted on only in 1915 and no action was taken on the bill for two years. Then there is really no evidence that any notice of dishonour was given to defendant 1 within a reasonable time after such dishonour. The plaintiff says that before instituting the suit, that is, some time in 1915 he asked defendant 1 for payment and that he promised to pay. That seems to me to be an absolute untruth. The defence of defendant 1 is that the bill had been long ago discharged. It is inconceivable that if the plaintiff made a demand upon him, he should have promised to pay. The learned Advocate-General has not really relied on the noting such as there is on this bill for the purpose of drawing any presumption of presentment and dishonour. It is a most peculiar entry by the Notary Public of Rangoon. All that it contains is "noted for non-payment." It does not give the date of dishonour as required by S. 99, Negotiable Intruments Act. Then there is no certificate of protest within the meaning of Ss. 100 and 101 of the Act. It is only where there is a proper protest that S. 119 would apply requiring the Court to presume the fact of dishonour.

As regards the question of discharge, it is one of the pleas of defendant 1. Of course the onus lies upon him to prove it. His allegation is that this bill was drawn in order to pay the price of some diamonds which he bought from defendant 2. He says that at his instance defendant 3 pledged these diamonds as well as some of his own jewels with one Puduvayal firm and that defendant 3 retained this hundi as a sort of security, although afterwards he (defendant 1) paid off the Puduvayal firm and redeemed the jewels by raising the money from one Thenappa Chetty. This Thenappa Chetty has not been examined, although he was present in Court being brought up under warrant. Nor is there any receipt to show payment either to defendant 2 or to the Puduvayal firm. While I am not prepared to say that the entire story of the defence in this connexion is unfounded since there is no explanation forthcoming as to why no action was taken nearly two years after the alleged dishonour, at the same time the onus being on defendant 1 to prove this plea it cannot be said that the evidence, such as it is, has made it out. However defendant 1 seems to be entitled to succeed on the other points which I have dealt with. Then the learned Advocate-General drew our attention to the unhappy wording of Ss. 91 to 94, Negotiable Instruments Act. S. 91 defines dishonour by non-acceptance, S. 92 defines dishonor by non-payment and says :

" A promissory note, bill of exchange or cheque is said to be dishonoured by non-payment when the maker of the note, acceptor of the bill or drawee of the cheque makes default in payment upon being duly required to pay the same. "

Section 93 provides for notice being given in cases of dishonour by non-acceptance or non-payment. The learned Advocate-General's argument is that these sections cannot apply to the present case inasmuch as this is not a bill payable after sight or after a fixed date, and therefore there can be no question here of acceptance or non-acceptance. S. 92 which defines dishonour by non-payment only deals, it is said, with the default of the acceptor of the bill and not the default of the drawee in cases where the bill does not require to be accepted. But the effect of this argument, if sound, pushed to its logical conclusion must be that there was no dishonour at all in this case, and the suit must on that account fail, because the effect of S. 30 of the Act is that the drawer of a bill of exchange is bound to compensate the holder only in case of dishonour by the drawee or acceptor. We were referred to S. 37 as also defining the liability of the drawer. That section only says that the drawer of a bill of exchange until acceptance is liable as principal debtor. But if the argument of the Advocate-General is right, there could be no question of acceptance in this case and S. 39 would have no application.

Apart from that, I do not think that the legislature intended to lay down that in the case of a bill payable at sight or on demand there can be no dishonour by nonpayment. In fact such a position seems to me to be so untenable that the Court would not be justified in imputing any such intention to the legislature if it could be helped. As is well known, the Negotiable Instruments Act was based on the principles of English law. The drafting of some of these sections seems to be rather loose, especially as regards the collocation of certain important phrases. For instance S. 93, para. 2, is to this effect:

"Nothing in this section renders it necessary to give notice to the maker of the dishonoured promissory note or the drawee or acceptor of the dishonoured bill of exchange or cheque."

Now, if we were to proceed on the line of interpretation suggested by the learned Advocate-General, then we will have to apply the word "acceptor" to cheques, while in the case of cheques there could hardly have been any question of acceptance within the contemplation of the legislature. Similar wording occurs in other sections as well. For instance, S. 99 says

"when a promissory note or a bill of exchange has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment, the holder may cause such dishonour to be noted by a Notary Public upon the instrument," surely the legislature could not have intended non-acceptance to be applicable to promissory notes and not to bills of exchange, although that will be the result of the order in which the words are allocated. I think the difficulty suggested by the arguments on behalf of the respondent may be met at least in two ways. S. 30 lays down that a drawee is liable to compensate the holder in case of dishonour, provided due notice of dishonour has been given as provided by the Act. Then S. 93 says that in case of non-acceptance or nonpayment of a promissory note, bill of exchange or cheque, the holder must give notice that the instrument has been dishonoured. I take it that what the legislature meant was that notice of dishonour should be given either of non-acceptance or nonpayment, whichever may be the case in the transaction in question. Then S. 94 lays down that such notice must be given within a reasonable time after dishonour. S. 93 indicates the parties to whom notice is to be given in cases where there is a succession of indorsers. But S. 30 is specifically applicable to the case of a drawer, and that read with S. 94 would be sufficient, so far as the liability of the drawer is concerned, to show that notice of dishonour is to be given in reasonable time. But it seems to me to be quite reasonable on the other hand to go further and say that Ss. 91, 92 and 93 were intended to be applicable to a bill payable on demand. It is quite true that the law does not require that in case of such bills there should be a presentment for acceptance. But if the drawee of a bill payable on demand refused to accept it, its practical effect is refusal to pay and becomes dishonoured by nonpayment. That is to say, there is nothing in law which precludes a bill payable on demand being presented for acceptance, although that may not be necessary. The word "acceptance" is not defined, but "acceptor" is: the drawee becomes the acceptor when he has signed his assent upon the bill. The English Statute Bills of Exchange Act defines acceptance as the signification by the drawee of his assent to the order of the drawer. That is clearly what is implied in the definition of the word acceptor in the Negotiable Instruments Act, and I do not see why it should not apply as much to a bill payable on demand as to a bill payable after sight or on a fixed date. S. 18 of the English Act says that a bill may be accepted when it is overdue. That would apply as well to a bill payable on demand as to a bill payable after sight. S. 30 of the same Act corroborates this interpretation. It says that in the case of a bill payable after sight presentment for acceptance is necessary in order to fix the maturity of the instrument, but in no other case is presentment for acceptance necessary in order to render liable any party to the bill. That implies that there may be presentment for acceptance of a bill payable on demand although it is not required by the law. The Negotiable Instruments Act does not expressly lay down that bills payable on demand or bills other than those payable after sight need not be presented for payment. But this undoubtedly followed from Ss. 61 and 64 which describe the bills that are required to be presented for payment or acceptance.

I am fortified in my interpretation of the Act with respect to this matter by a decision of the Bombay High Court in Ram Ravji Jambhekar v. Pralhaddas Subkarn (1). That was a case of a bill payable after a fixed date, but it was presented for acceptance before the expiry of that date although the Negotiable Instruments Act does not contemplate such presentment. The drawee refused to accept the bill and it was never presented for payment afterwards. It was held that there was a good cause of action, and the learned Judges observe at pp. 141 and 142 that although the law does not require presentment for acceptance of a bill payable after a fixed date before such date has arrived, yet under the English law it was not only allowable but was strongly advisable to do so, and that the Negotiable Instruments Act made no alteration in that respect. They point out that presentment for acceptance must always and in every case precede presentment for payment, and that the drawer of a bill contracts that whenever a bill is duly presented it will, subject to the provisions of S. 63, be accepted. Then they say when it is dishonoured by non-acceptance, as well as when it is dishonoured by nonpayment, the provisions of Ch. 8 (in which Ss. 91 to 94 occur) come into play. They point out:

> "It is true that there is no explicit declaration of the law upon this subject as in S. 43 of the English Act. But the whole scope and tenor of Ch. 8 of the Indian Act appear to contemplate the same result as is there declared to follow from non-acceptance."

I may also refer to a ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Jeetun Lall v. Sheo Churn (2), which was before the passing of the Negotiable Instruments Act. It shows that the provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Act are really based on the principles of the English Common law relating to mercantile instruments, and there can be no doubt whatever that, as pointed out there, the law has always been both in England and in India that there must be dishonour and notice of dishonour given within reasonable time in order to sustain an action against the drawee or any other holder of the bill. The appeal of defendant 1 must therefore be allowed and the decree of the Subordinate Judge as against him will be set aside and the suit against him dismissed with costs here and in the Court below.

Oldfield, J.—I agree with my learned brother's decision on the questions of fact and of law. As regards the latter I wish to add only that the law of negotiable instruments is, as it has been described, cosmopolitan; and in the present case, where we have no special considerations arising with reference to the circumstances of Indian business we are justified in endeavouring to read the statute, if it is possible to do so, conformably to the provisions of the English law which follows the general commercial law of the rest of the world. There is no dispute that under the English law the argument of the learned Advocate-General would be absolutely unsustainable, and a reference to the Bills of Exchange Act is sufficient to show that. In those circumstances it is our duty to scrutinize the language used in the Negotiable Instruments Act most carefully, and I am glad to be able to hold that the refusal to pay referred to in S. 92 includes the refusal to accept such as is contemplated in S. 91, which is a possible, though not an invariable or obligatory, preliminary to payment being demanded at all. That is shortly the ground on which I agree with my learned brother.

(1) [1896] 20 Bom. 133.

(2) [1865] 2 W. R. 214.

Judgment.—The ruling in Koneti Naicker v. Gopala Aiyar (1) is not applicable to the present case, as here defendant 2 has signed his name with the initials of the firm of defendant 1 and has expressly stated in the note that the debit was to be against the firm. This is not a case of mere description of the executant as an agent in the body of the note. The words used here exclude the application of S. 28, Negotiable Instruments Act (16 of 1881), as there is sufficient indication in the note that defendant 2 was excluding his personal liability. The principal, defendant 1, has accepted his liability under the note. The plaintiff's case that defendant 2 was a partner of defendant 1 was not established, there being no evidence for it; we do not think the first Court meant to find any partnership. The Letters Patent appeal fails and is dismissed with costs of respondent 1.

Judgment.—In this case the petitioner purchased the property privately from the judgment-debtor. Other persons had purchased portions of the property before him; counter-petitioner 2 is an auction-purchaser. The contention of the petitioner is that as he himself and the previous vendees have paid the full amount of the decree the sale should be set aside. The lower appellate Court held, following the decision of this Court in Karunakara Menon v. Krishna

Menon (1), that as the petitioner paid only a portion of the amount he is not entitled to ask that the auction should be set aside. That decision has been sought to be distinguished before me. In my opinion the lower appellate Court is right in holding that the present case is covered by the authority cited by the lower appellate Court. Even apart from this view I fail to see what question of jurisdiction there can be for interference under S. 115, Civil P. C. As was pointed out by the Judicial Committee in Balakrishna Udayar v. Vasudeva Aiyar (2), the mere fact that a wrong decision has been given on a question of law would not enable an appellate Court to interfere with the order of the Court below under S. 115. For both these reasons I uphold the judgment of the Court below and dismiss the petition with costs of respondent 2.

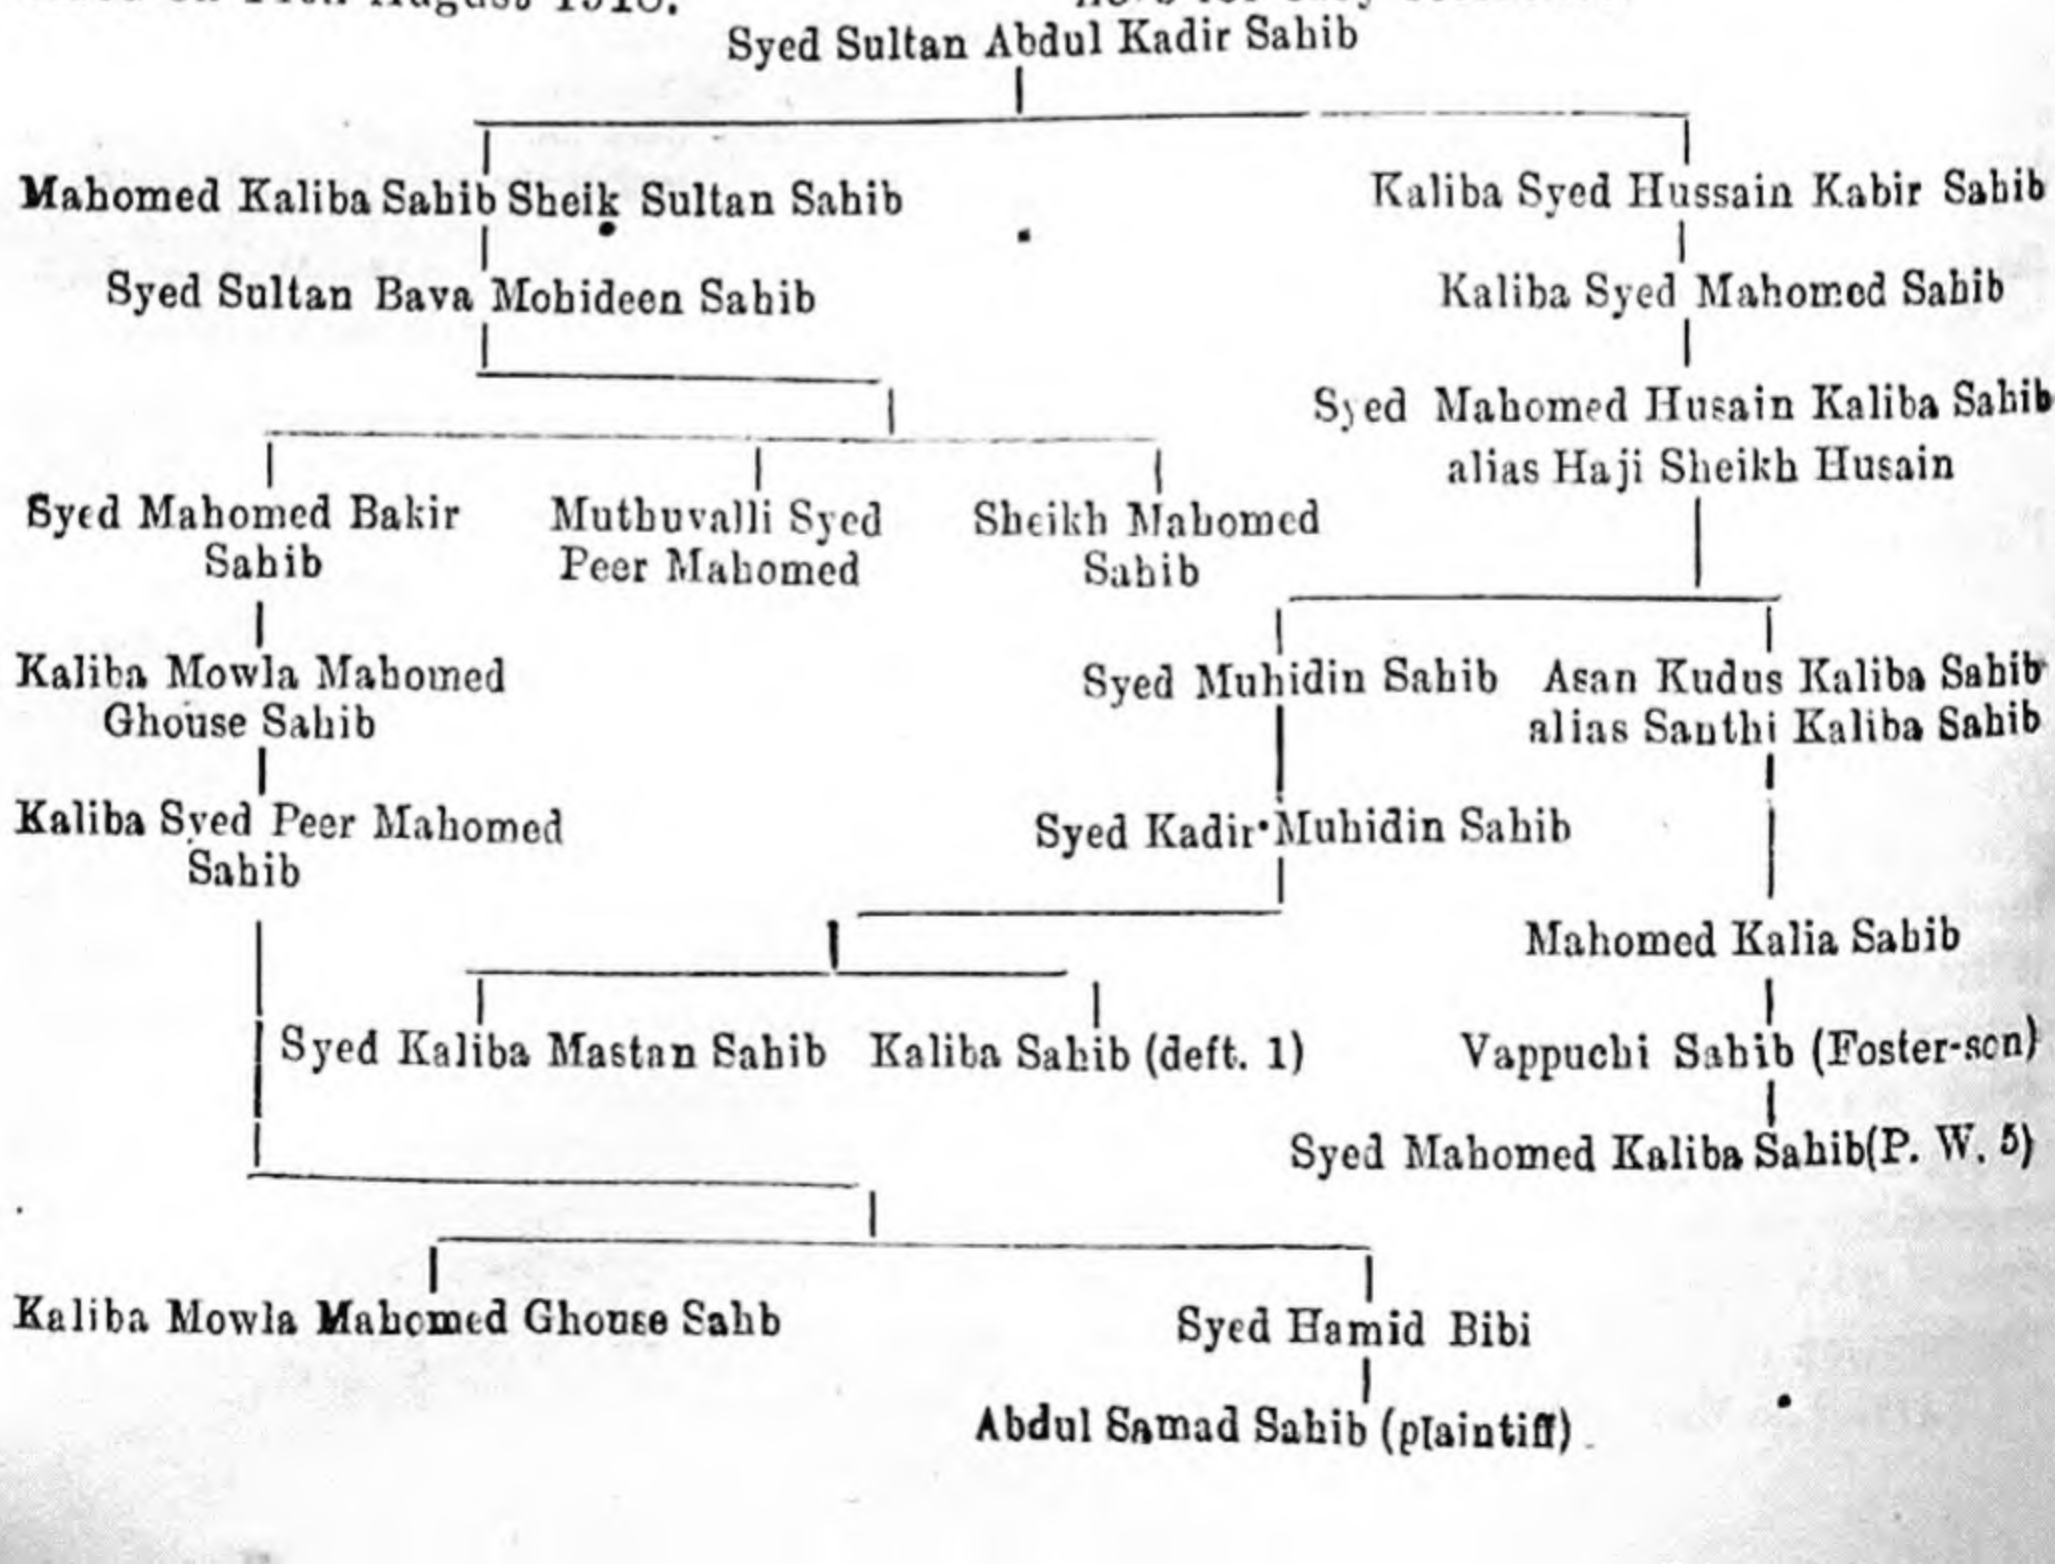
Judgment.—The plaintiff is the appellant. The genealogical tree found at p. 16 of the printed papers is admitted to be correct and I shall reproduce it here for easy reference:



On one question of fact which was in dispute in this case, namely whether plaintiff was appointed by his maternal grandfather Syed Peer Mahomad Sahib to the office of Kalibath, I take it that the lower appellate Court finds against the plaintiff in the negative, and that finding being a finding of fact is binding on us in second appeal. I shall, now assume (without deciding) the validity of the plaintiff's contention that his maternal grandfather, Syed Peer Mahomed Sahib who held Kaliba office till 1913 for more than 50 years, was the full and sole owner of that office at his death and that it was a hereditary office to which Peer Mahomed Sahib's heir was entitled to succeed. On that assumption, the question of Mahomedan Law which arises for decision is, whether the plaintiff (the daughter's son of the last holder of the office) is entitled to inherit it as the nearest kindred or whether defendant 1, who is descended from the great-grandfather's great grandfather of the deceased in the agnate line, as residuary, is the next heir. The plaintiff's contention is that the great-grandfather's great-grandfather's descendant is not a residuary heir at all under the Mahomedan Law, it being admitted by him that the residuaries inherit under the Mahomedan Law, in priority to distant kindred. The contention of the appellant is that agnates who are descended from an ancestor more remote than the grandfather's grandfather are not residuaries in their own right according to the Mahomedan Law. So far as the descendants of the grandfather's grandfather are concerned, he is obliged to make the admission that they are residuaries because even the original texts relied on by him (from the Durrul Mukhtar, Sirajiya and Fatawa Alamgiri) do mention the descendants of the grandfather's grandfather as residuaries.

As regards the descendants of remoter ancestors, we have got two direct decisions one (so long ago as in 1805) in Shah Ilahi Buksh v. Shah Gasim Ali (1) and the other in Mahomed Haneef v. Mahomed Masoom (2). These decisions interpret the texts of the Mahomedan Law as laying down that agnates, however remote, are entitled to inherit as residuaries in the absence of nearer agnates, that residuary heirship is not confined either to the grandfather's (father's father's) descendants (as argued in some cases) or to grandfather's grandfather's descendants, but extends to the agnate descendants of a "true" grandfather however high in scale. In those two cases the right of a person descended from a remoter ancestor than the grandfather's grandfather was upheld. The learned Judges evidently treat the examples given in the texts (which extend only up to the grandfather's paternal uncle's descendants) as merely illustrative and not exhaustive. All the notable text-writers including Bailee, Ameer Ali, Sarcar and Wilson (see the table at p 291 of Wilson's Digest, 4th Edn.) adopt the same interpretation of the texts. In two decisions of this Court also: Mohidin Ahmad Khan v. Sayyid Muhammad (3) and Indian Jurist, Old Series the same interpretation is followed. The word "grandfather" seems to be used to indicate an ancestor in the paternal line however remote, in the Mahomedan Law books just, as the word "pitamaha" in Sanskrit is used to denote even the remotest ancestor of man, Brahma himself. I do not think I am competent to pass criticisms on all the above Mahomedan Law authorities, and the criticisms we have listened to from Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar on them have not satisfied me that they fell into any error in formulating their considered opinions as above. Following them, I hold that defendant 1, though descended from the great-grandfather's grandfather of the propositus, is (as an agnate descended from the nearest ancestor of Peer Mahomed who has left descendants in the male line) to be preferred as Peer Mahomed Sahib's heir to the plaintiff who is only a daughter's son (a cognate) and who comes therefore among the inferior class of distant kinsmen. I shall repeat that it is unnecessary to decide whether the Kalibath office was really a hereditary office in the hands of Peer Mahomed as the plaintiff's suit fails even if it was so. The Second appeal is therefore dismissed with costs, two sets.

The memorandum of objections is dismissed. There will be no costs.

Second Appeal No. 1561 of 1917, Decided on 30th October 1918, against decree of Sub-Judge, South Canara, in Appeal Suit No. 59 of 1917.

Interest—Post diem—Liability to pay—Intention of parties how to be considered stated.

Post diem interest is payable on a mortgage bond on the general promise by the debtor to be liable for interest, though a definite term is fixed in the bond for repayment of principal and interest. If the liability under that general undertaking to pay interest is further extended by another undertaking which may be called appurtenant to the principal undertaking to pay interest upon arrears of interest and this further undertaking is found in the same document following the provision to pay interest, the intention of the parties must be deemed to be that both the principal and appurtenant undertaking should apply to the question of liability for post diem interest : 19 All. 39 (*P. Judgment.—We think we are bound by the Privy Council decisions in Mathura Das v. Raja Narindar Bahadur (1) and Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (2) and the decisions of this Court in Ghantayya v. Papayya (3) and Ramanathan Chetty v. Nur Muhamad Marakayar (4) to hold that post diem interest is payable on the general promise by the debtor to be liable for interest, though a definite term is fixed in the bond for repayment of the principal and interest. If the liability under that general undertaking to pay interest is further extended by another undertaking (which may be called appurtenant to the principal undertaking) to pay interest, upon arrears of interest and which further undertaking is found in the same document following the provision to pay interest, it is difficult to hold that the parties intended that only the principal undertaking should apply to the question of the liability for post diem interest and not the appurtenant undertaking also. As regards Chajmal Das v. Brij Bhukan Lal (5) that was decided before Mathura Das v. Raja Narindar Bahadur (1) and their Lordships, after reluctantly agreeing with the High Court that there was no covenant to pay post diem interest, gave interest by way of damages taking the principal undertaking alone as a guide for the measure of damages and not the appurtenant undertaking also. Thaithottathil Pokkar v. Ramchandra Shenoy (6) is a similar case. These decisions are of no assistance when considering the question as to whether compound interest is allowable where post diem interest is granted on the covenant and not as damages in the absence of a covenant. On the other hand, the decisions in Bindesri Naik v. Ganga Saran Sahu (2) and Ramanathan Chetty v. Muhamad Marakayar (4) proceed on the view that both the covenants can be availed of by the creditor in respect of post diem interest.

We therefore allow the second appeal and restore the decision of the District Munsif dismissing with costs the defendants' appeal to the lower appellate Court. The respondents will pay appellant's costs in this Court. Six months' time will be allowed for payment from this date.

Civil Misc. Petn. No. 1790 of 1918, Decided on 23rd August 1918.

Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), O. 41-A, R. 2—Party not served with notice of appeal has right to apply to set aside ex parte order—Madras High Court (Appellate Side) Rules. R. 42.

Rule 42 of the Appellate Side Rules of the Madras High Court does not prevent a party who has not been served with notice of appeal, from applying to set aside any order passed ex parte in the appeal on the ground that he has not entered appearance. He cannot be penalized for not entering appearance by losing his right to receive notice of interlocutory applications, when such applications are made within the time limited for his entering appearance. [P 187 C 2]

K. S. Jayarama Aiyar—for Petitioner.

T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, P. R. Ramakrishna Aiyar and K. Bhashyam—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—This is an application to set aside the order passed by me on 12th July 1918, allowing the appellants to file an additional ground of appeal and to amend the valuation of the appeal. Notice of the application to amend was not given to respondent 6, and the order was passed without hearing him. O. 41-A, R. 2, Cl. 2, Civil P. C., provides that, unless otherwise ordered, the period for respondent to enter appearance shall be 25 days from the service of notice upon him, and that if he wants to appear and defend the appeal, he should enter appearance within that period. R. 42 of the Appellate Side Rules provides that notice of an application to amend a memorandum of appeal should be given to all parties who have entered appearance. I do not think that R. 42 prevents a party, who has not been served with the notice on the ground that he has not entered appearance, from applying to set aside the order passed ex parte. If any penalty is attached for his not entering appearance within the time limited, that penalty can only arise when the period fixed for entering appearance has expired. It will be against all principles of equity to hold that a person should be punished for not entering appearance by losing his rights to receive notice of all interlocutory applications, when such applications are made within the time limited for his entering appearance. In the present case the applicant was declared a major on 27th March 1918 and he got notice of appeal in the usual course entitling him to enter appearance on 8th July. The petition to amend the memorandum of appeal was filed on 25th April and no notice was sent to him, the appellant relying on R. 42 referred to above.

I am of opinion that respondent 6 ought to have had notice of the application and that he is entitled to have the ex parte order set aside so far as he is concerned and to be heard on the merits. I accordingly set aside the order of 12th July. As the pleadings and grounds of appeal have been printed, I think the best thing to do will be to direct that the application for leave to file additional grounds and amend the valuation be posted before the Bench hearing the appeal. The additional ground need no additional printing, as the ground raises a pure question of law, and as the appeal is filed in forma pauperis, no delay need be caused by the amendment of the valuation. There will be thus no necessity for any adjournment of the appeal by reason of the petition being posted for hearing with it. Leave is granted to all the parties to file such additional affidavits as they may consider necessary in one month. I make no order as to costs.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 74 of 1918, Decided on 15th February 1918, from order of Small Cause Court, Madras, in Ejectment Suit No. 36 of 1918.

Presidency Small Cause Courts Act (1882), S. 41—Suit to eject from portion of house—Rent of portion being less than Rs. 1000 - Suit is cognizable by Small Cause Court—Decision of question of title for exercise of jurisdiction—Revision is incompetent—Civil P. C. S. 115, Govt. of India Act S. 107.

A suit to eject a tenant of a portion of a house, the rent of which is less than Rs 1,000 per annum, is cognizable by a Presidency Small Cause Court, though the annual rent of the whole building exceeds Rs. 1,000. [P 187 C 2]

In such a suit, where the Court goes into the question of title to enable it to exercise jurisdiction, its order cannot be set aside by the High Court as being without jurisdiction. [P 188 C 1]

V. C. Seshachariar and Raghavachariar—for Petitioner.

Judgment.—The first point taken is that the learned Judge has not found that plaintiff is the next reversioner. There is no suggestion that there are any other reversioners and I take the finding of the lower Court that plaintiff is the reversioner to mean that he is the next reversioner. It is argued that though the rent payable by the defendant is only Rs. 6 a month, the annual rent of the whole building of which defendant is occupying a part should be taken into consideration for deciding the jurisdiction of the Small Cause Court under S. 41 of the Act. Defendant having become a tenant of only one or two rooms, this suit has reference only to those rooms and it seems to me that as the rent payable by him annually is much less than Rs. 1,000, the suit comes within the cognizance of the Presidency Small Cause Court.

It is also argued that the Small Cause Court should not have gone into any question of title but where the Court goes into the question to enable it to exercise its jurisdiction, its order cannot be set aside as being without jurisdiction. There is no ground for interference under S. 115, Civil P. C., nor under S. 107, Government of India Act. The civil revision petition is dismissed.

MOORE, J.

Pullannavara Hanumantha, In re.—Accused—Petitioner.

Criminal Revn. No. 282 of 1919, and Criminal Revn. Petn. No. 236 of 1919. Decided on 15th September 1919, against judgment of Sess. Judge, Bellary, in Criminal Appeal No. 22 of 1919.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 423—Altering finding though maintaining sentence should not be done if prejudice is caused by alteration in charge.

Although an appellate Court has power under S. 423 to alter the finding of a lower Court, while maintaining the sentence, it ought not to use such power if the accused would be prejudiced by the omission to prove the altered charge and if the defence might have been of a different character had the altered charge been framed in the first Court. [P 189 C 1]

S. Swaminathan—for Petitioner.

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Judgment.—The petitioner and five other persons were convicted of the offence of rioting armed with deadly weapons (S. 148, I. P. C). On appeal the Sessions Judge of Bellary altered the finding in the case of the petitioner (accused 1) to one under Ss. 326 and 511, I. P. C., and maintained the sentence but reversed the convictions of the other accused. The facts, as found by the lower Courts, are shortly these: There had been ill feeling between accused 6 and P. W. 4, the Sub-Inspector of Police of Kowtalam, and there was a charge against accused 6 of having wrongfully confined P. W. 4 and P. W. 8. The Sub-Inspector of Adoni, who had been deputed to investigate the case, learning that accused 6 had sent for some bad characters from Halvy to commit offences against the police, deputed a party of Head Constables and Constables with instructions to watch the path from Halvy, and to catch any Halvy people or strangers who might pass that way. Soon after midnight on 7th May 1918 the police, who were lying in ambush, saw ten or fifteen persons approaching armed with weapons, and surrounded them. In the melee the petitioner aimed a blow with a battle axe at one of the Constables (P. W. 2). The latter warded off the blow with his lathi which was cut, but no hurt was actually caused to P. W. 2. Five persons including the petitioner were illegally arrested by the police. The Subdivisional Magistrate framing a charge under S. 148, I. P. C., against accused 1 to 5 improperly omitted to state in the charge what the common object of the unlawful assembly was. The charge as framed was in these terms:

"Iha you at Halvy armed with deadly weapons, i. e., battle axes, taxes, and sticks, committed rioting and attempted to strike P. Ws. 1, 2, 3 and 5, and that accused 1 aimed a blow with his battle axe at P. W. 2".

The Sessions Judge came to the conclusion that it was not proved that the accused were members of an unlawful assembly, that the conduct of the accused showed that it was not their intention to attack the police, that the police had no right to arrest the accused merely because they saw them coming along the road and that no offence had been committed by accused 2 to 6. The Sessions Judge was however of opinion that a clear case under Ss. 226 and 511, I. P. C., had been made out against the petitioner and that the petitioner was not justified in using violence and aiming a blow with an axe before any arrest had been effected by the police. Dr. Swaminathan for the petitioner contended that the Sessions Judge acted illegally in altering the conviction under S. 148, I. P. C., into one of more serious offences under Ss. 326 and 511, I. P. C., that such an alteration of finding is not warranted by the provisions of S. 423, Criminal P. C., and that the facts found would not justify a conviction under S. 326, I. P. C., read with S. 511, I. P. C. Under S. 423 (1) (b), Criminal P. C., an appellate Court has the power to alter the finding of the lower Court maintaining the sentence.

It is urged that in cases not falling under Ss. 237 and 238, Criminal P. C., the appellate Court cannot convict a person of an offence with which he was not charged in the first Court, and reliance is placed on the decisions in Padmanabha Payi Panniah v. Emperor (1), Criminal Revision Case No. 83 of 1919, Mongalu Aorodhone Hathi, In re (2) and Golla Hanumappa v. Emperor (3). (2) [1917] 41 I. C. 828.
(3) [1912] 35 Mad. 243=10 I. C. 372.

Aorodhone Hathi v. Emperor (2) it was held by a Bench of this Court, following Dasarath Mandal v. Emperor (4), that when persons were convicted of rioting and acquitted on appeal, but were convicted by the appellate Court of house trespass and hurt (Ss. 448 and 323, I. P. C.), the convictions were illegal on the ground that the accused could not be convicted of offences with which they were never charged. It is no doubt true that although hurt is generally caused in rioting, it does not necessarily follow that hurt is so caused. In this case however the charge, although it was carelessly drawn up, distinctly sets out that accused aimed a blow with his axe at P. W. 2. The true principle appears to be that laid down in Yakub Ali v. Lethu Thakur (5), namely that if the accused have been prejudiced by the omission to prove the altered charge and if the defence might have been of a different character had the altered charge been framed in the first Court, the appellate Court should not use the power vested in it by S. 423, Criminal P. C., to give such an altered finding. This was the view taken by Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Mannar Krishnan Chetty, In re (6) and I respectfully adopt it. It is suggested that the petitioner was prejudiced in his defence, as he had no opportunity of pleading that he was justified in resisting the illegal arrest and that in attempting to cause hurt he acted in the exercise of the right of private defence. It was open however to the petitioner to put forward this plea in the lower Court. He denied having used violence and in fact the defence was that accused 1 to 5 were arrested not on the Halvy path but while they were passing the police station at Kowtalam. The lower Court found that the petitioner commenced the assault and aimed a blow at P. W. 2, which struck the lathi he was carrying.

The conviction of the petitioner under Ss. 326 and 511, I. P. C., is not, I think, bad in law, but the sentence, one year's rigorous imprisonment, is, in my opinion, much too severe. The police appear to have acted in a high-handed and illegal manner. I confirm the conviction but reduce the sentence to one of three months' rigorous imprisonment. The petitioner must surrender to his bail and serve the unexpired portion of the sentence. I see no reason to interfere with the order directing the petitioner to give security under S. 106, Criminal P. C.

(a) Guardians and Wards Act (1890), S. 4 (2)—De facto guardian is guardian.

A de facto guardian is a guardian within the meaning of S. 4 (2). [P 189 C 2]

(b) Guardians and Wards Act (1890), Ss. 4 (2) and 7 (2)—Appointment of statutory guardian removes de facto guardian.

The appointment of a statutory guardian under the Act, ipso facto removes a de facto guardian from guardianship under S. 7 (2) of the Act. [P 189 C 2]

It is competent to the Court to require a de facto guardian under S. 41 (3) to deliver the minor's property in his possession to a guardian appointed or declared under the Act. [P 189 C 2]

(d) Guardians and Wards Act (1890), Ss 48 and 41 (3)—"Orders made under the Act" does not cover requisition.

Judgment.—In this petition we are asked to interfere in revision with the proceedings of the District Judge of Tanjore requiring a de facto guardian (grandmother) of a minor under S. 41 (3), Guardians and Wards Act, to hand over a house as one belonging to the minor. We can find no ground for interference. The term "guardian" in the sections must be understood in the light of the definitions in S. 4 (2) and would include the present petitioner. The latter was ipso facto removed from guardianship under S. 7 (2) by the Court's order appointing the minor's mother to be guardian. The District Judge has not exceeded his jurisdiction and petitioner must be referred to a suit to establish, if she can, her title to the house. We may remark that S. 48, Guardians and Wards Act, which refers to "orders made under the Act" would not cover the case of a "requisition" under S. 41 (3), of the Act: vide reference to the latter in S. 45 (1)(c).

The petition is dismissed with costs.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 233—S. 233 does not apply to inquiry by committing Magistrate.

An inquiry before a committing Magistrate is not a trial and does not come within the prohibition contained in S. 233. [P 191 C 1]

An order of commitment to the Sessions Court cannot be quashed on the ground that the Magistrate took cognizance of the complaint without the sanction required by Ss. 195 and 197. Ss. 531 and 537 apply to such cases, and their applicability is not affected by the fact that objection to want of sanction was taken at the earliest possible opportunity: 35 *I. Semble.—A Sessions Court has power to acquit the accused in a case committed to it on the ground of want of sanction. [P 190 C 2]

G. Krishnaswami Aiyar and K. S. Jayarama Aiyar—for Accused.

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—This is a reference by the Sessions Judge of Tanjore asking us to quash the commitment made to his Court by the Third Class Magistrate of Arantangi. The accused are four in number, the charge against accused 1 and 3 being that they committed offences under Ss. 193, 465, 466 and 471, I. P. C., in connexion with the document Ex. D and the charge against accused 1, 2 and 4 being that they committed similar offences in connexion with the document Ex. N. The order of the Magistrate committing the accused falls under S. 213 (1), Criminal P. C. Before the Sessions Judge it was argued by the Public Prosecutor that under the provisions of Ss. 531 and 537, Criminal P. C., a superior Court had no power to set aside the Magistrate's order of commitment, granting that the Arantangi Magistrate had no territorial jurisdiction over the place where accused 3 and 4 are alleged to have committed the offences, and granting further that sanctions under Ss. 195 and 197, Criminal P. C., were required as regards some or all of the accused. The Sessions Judge overruled the above contention founded on Ss. 531 and 537. I am however unable to agree with the Sessions Judge that Ss. 531 and 537, Criminal P. C., are not applicable.

I further respectfully dissent from the decision in Zahir Singh v. Emperor (1), in which it was held that where the objection based on want of sanction is taken at the earliest opportunity, S. 537 would not cover the case of proceedings conducted by a Magistrate in the absence of necessary sanction against the accused. In the case of Sankaralinga Tevan v. Avudai Ammal (2) the provisions of S. 537 were evidently not brought to the notice of the learned Judge who decided it. The committing Magistrate himself might have refused to take cognizance of the case in the absence of sanction. It may also be that the Sessions Judge is entitled to acquit the accused on the ground of want of sanction, as S. 537 prohibits only the Court before whom the case comes on appeal or revision from treating the want of sanction as material, unless it had occasioned a failure of justice. (It could only be in very exceptional cases that mere want of sanction could itself occasion a failure of justice). It is next urged that as regards Ex. N

"there is no evidence to show that it was not drawn up as it stands now on the date it bears, and that Ss. 465 and 471, I. P. C., have no application to the manufacture of such a document as there is no legal evidence before the committing Magistrate on which a conviction could be based under these sections."

This Court has got the power to set aside a commitment only on a question of law. I was at first inclined to hold that the commitment of accused 1, 2 and 4, so far as it related to the acts alleged against them in connexion with Ex. N, might, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, be so set aside. But my learned brother thinks that this a matter which ought to be more appropriately dealt with by the Sessions Judge himself in the proceedings before him, and I do not wish to press my own view of the matter. (We express no opinion on the question whether sanction is or is not required as that question does not properly arise before us at this stage of the case.)

As regards misjoinder, S.233, Criminal P. C., no doubt prohibits the joint trial of separate charges with respect to separate transactions. But an inquiry before a committing Magistrate is not a trial and does not come within the prohibition contained in S. 233, and we are asked by this reference to deal only with the proceedings of the committing Magistrate, the trial itself having to take place before the Sessions Judge hereafter. Of course, the Sessions Judge has got power in a proper case to hold separate trials as regards separate offences so as not to contravene the provisions of S. 233. He has also got the power to acquit if there is no legal evidence, and the Public Prosecutor also would no doubt in a proper case withdraw the prosecution if there is no legal evidence to support it. But all this has to be done in the proceedings before the Sessions Judge and so far as the order of the Magistrate committing the accused is concerned, I do not think that sufficient reason has been shown for quashing that order.

I would therefore decline to accept the reference and would order the records to be returned to the Sessions Judge.

Napier, J.—I agree.

Second Appeal No. 1998 of 1918, Decided on 22nd August 1919, against the decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Tellicherry, in Appeal Suit No. 699 of 1916.

(a) Malabar Law — Tarwad—Kanom by karnavan found not binding—Junior member can sue on behalf of Tarwad for not merely declaration but possession.

Where a karnavan of a Malabar tarwad grants a kanom which is found not to be binding on the tarward, and the tenants of the tarwad attorn to the alienee, an anandravan or a junior member of the tarwad has the right to sue for possession of the alienated properties on behalf of the tarwad, and his remedy is not confined to merely suing for a declaration. [P 191 C 2]

(b) Possession—Receipt of rent is possession—Rival claimants can sue for possession without impleading tenants in possession.

Receipt of rent is possession which can be recovered in a suit. Where tenants are in actual possession rival claimants to the property can sue for possession without impleading the tenants as defendants: 33 Mad. 452, Appl.; 17 Mad 232 and 3 I. C. 41, Dist. [P 192 C 1]

(c) Malabar Law—Tarwad—Alienee of tarwad is stranger and can be sued by other members.

The position of an anandravan who gets an alienation of the tarwad properties is not different from that of a stranger. If he ousts the tarwad, he may be sued by the other members just as if he was a stranger. [P 192 C 2]

K. P. M. Menon—for Appellant.

C. Madhavan Nair—far Respondent.

Judgment.—This is a suit by a junior member of a tarwad who obtained permission to conduct the suit on behalf of all its members for possession of certain tarwad properties. The predecessor of the present karnavan, defendant 1, gave a kanom in 1904 to defendant 2 under Ex. 10. Thereupon the tenants of the tarwad attorned to defendant 2 and paid him rent. It was found by both the lower Courts that there was no consideration for the kanom and that it is not binding on the tarwad. The only ground urged by Mr. Menon in second appeal is that the possession of the defendant, if any, must be deemed to be possession of the tarwad and that the only remedy open to an anandravan under the circumstances is to sue for a declaration. He also contended that this is a subterfuge to evade the law of limitation as a suit for declaration would have been barred. Strong reliance was placed upon Padammah v. Themona Ammah (1) for this contention. There can be no doubt that, on the facts found by the lower Courts and accepted in second appeal by the High Court, that judgment was right. It was found in that case that the karnavathi, although she executed certain deeds in favour of her daughters, did not part with possession of the alienated properties. There was no finding that the tenants paid any rent to the transferees. In these circumstances it was held that an anandravan can secure the rights of the tarwad by suing for a declaration without any consequential relief as to possession.

(1) [1894] 17 Mad. 232.

There are no doubt observations in that judgment about "unity of possession" and about the possession of the tenant being the possession of the tarwad, etc. But they must be read with the facts of the case and do not support the contention that under no circumstances can a junior member of a tarwad sue for possession if the tarwad had parted with possession, The next case, Parakandyolparkun Kishakkayil v. Kilath Puthiya Purayil Ahmad (2), is clearly distinguishable from the present case. In that case what stood between the tarwad and defendant 3, the alienee, was a piece of paper under which no possession passed. The learned Judges must be taken to have held that this impediment in the way of the tarwad, which might at any time endanger its rights, might best be removed by obtaining a declaration that the document was invalid. Neither of the two decisions quoted by the learned counsel is authority for the broad proposition that a rightful owner can never sue for possession unless he wants physical possession.

The acceptance of such a contention would mean that, in cases where tenants are actually in possession, rival claimants cannot seek to recover possession unless all the tenants are impleaded as defendants. R. 36, O. 21, Civil P. C., to which Mr. Madavan Nair drew our attention negatives this proposition. It has been held in Rathnasabapathi Pillai v. Ramasami Aiyar (3) that a receipt of rent by a trustee is possession which can be recovered in a suit. In Jagannatha Charry v. Rama Rayer (4) it was held that where tenants are actually on the land, and the defendant collected rent from them, it was a matter to which the provisions of S. 9, Specific Relief Act, relating to possession applied. These decisions support the view taken by the Courts below that a suit like the present one is maintainable. Mr. Menon suggested that the position of an anandravan who obtains a kanom and gets attornment is different from that of a stranger. The character in which an alienee anandravan holds possession will depend upon how far he ousts the tarwad, and not upon whether he is a member of it or not. If the tarwad is ousted then the possession of the ouster, whether he be a member of it or not, is as injurious to the tarwad as ouster by a stranger and the member in possession must be sued as if he was a stranger. The principle is not inconsistent with the observations in Padammah v. Themana Ammah (1). For these reasons the second appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Civil Misc. Appeal No. 174 of 1918, Decided on 27th November 1918, against order of Dist. Judge, Tinnevelly, in Appeal Suit No. 86 of 1917, D/- 26th November 1917.

(a) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Ss. 37, 38—Mortgage decree passed by Court having no territorial jurisdiction over hypotheca—Application for execution cannot be presented to Court having jurisdiction without transfer of decree from Court which passed it.

A mortgage decree was passed by the Additional Munsif's Court of Tinnevelly, which had no jurisdiction over the hypotheca but which was established only to aid the other Courts. An application for execution was made to the Koilpatti Munsif's Court which had jurisdiction over the hypotheca, but without a transfer of the decree from the Additional Munsif's Court which had not ceased to exist:

Held: that the Koilpatti Munsif's Court had no jurisdiction to execute until the decree was transferred to it by the Court which had passed it. [P 193 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C., (1908), Ss. 38 and 39—Transfer cannot be made to validate invalid application.

No transfer of a decree should be made for execution so as to evade the provisions of the Limitation Act or to validate an invalid application. [P 193 C 1]

L. A. Govindaraghava Aiyar—for Appellants.

M. D. Devadoss—for Respodents.

Judgment.—The appeal turns solely on the question of whether the District Munsif of Koilpatti had jurisdiction to entertain a petition (Execution Petition No. 190 of 1916) presented to him for execution of a mortgage decree passed by the Additional District Munsif of Tinnevelly in Original Suit No. 280 of 1906 on his file. Territorial jurisdiction over the hypotheca sought to be brought to sale in execution of the mortgage decree admittedly lay with the Koilpatti Court while the Tinnevelly Court had no local jurisdiction at all, but was established simply to aid the other Courts of the District, by disposing of suits transferred from their file. There had been a transfer of territorial jurisdiction to the Koilpatti Court from that of Srivilliputtur in which the suit had originally been filed; but it is agreed that this circumstance makes no difference to the question for disposal, and we may consider the latter as if territorial jurisdiction had always been with the Koilpatti Court. No order had been passed transferring the decree under S. 24 or S. 39, Civil P. C., and the question is whether in these circumstances the Koilpatti Court had jurisdiction to execute it under S. 38, Civil P. C., as the Court which passed it. In our opinion the answer must be in the negative. S. 37, Civil P. C., gives an extended significance to the term "Court which passed a decree," but contains nothing applicable to the present case.

The Tinnevelly Court has certainly not ceased to exist and it cannot be said to have ceased to have jurisdiction to execute its own decree. Whatever jurisdiction as regards execution it possessed at the time of passing the decree, it still possesses. In fact this portion of S. 37, Civil P. C., clearly has reference to transfers of territorial jurisdiction from one Court to another. We must therefore hold that the Koilpatti Court had no jurisdiction to execute the decree, unless and until the decree-holder got the decree transferred to it for execution. The order of the Koilpatti District Munsif rejecting the execution petition was therefore right. In the concluding portion of his judgment, the District Judge directs that his order allowing execution should operate as a transfer of the decree to the Koilpatti Court's file; but, in so doing, he appears to have overlooked the fact that at the date of his order an application for execution would apparently have been time-barred unless petitioner could claim the benefit of S. 14, the Lim. Act, a point which has not been considered. No transfer order should be made so as to evade the provisions of Lim. Act, or to validate an invalid application. The District Judge's order must be set aside and that of the District Munsif restored with costs to the appellant throughout.

Criminal Revn. No. 698 of 1918, and Criminal Revn. Petn. No. 563 of 1918, Decided on 26th March 1919, against order of Subdivl. Magistrate, Malapuram, in Misc. Case No. 28 of 1918.

(a) Criminal P. C. (5 of 1898), S. 488—Offspring of Malabar Sambandam marriage are not entitled to maintenance where mother can be maintained by tavazhi.

The offspring of a Malabar Sambandam marriage are not entitled to an order for maintenance under S. 488, where the tavazhi or tarwad to which their mother is attached has sufficient funds to maintain them: 39 Mad. 957, Foll. Case-law reviewed. [P 193 C 2]

(b) Criminal P. C. (5 of 1898), S. 488—Words "unable to maintain itself" refer to not only its age but financial dependency.

Per Napier, J.—The words "unable to maintain itself" in S. 488, Criminal P. C., cannot be confined to the tender age of the child but must also have reference to its financial dependency. [P 194 C 2]

(c) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 489—Tarwad funds becoming insufficient is change of circumstances within S. 489.

Where the amount available from the tavazhi or tarwad funds becomes insufficient to maintain the children, that would be a change of circumstances within the meaning of S. 489 of the Code. [P 195 C 1]

(d) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 1—Term Special law has no reference to local family law.

Ayling, J.—Petitioner and respondent in this case are both Nairs following Marumakatayam law, and the four children in respect of whom petitioner claims maintenance are the offspring of a sambandam between them. The Subdivisional Magistrate finding that petitioner's tavazhi, from which the children admittedly had a right to maintenance, was able to maintain them, has dismissed the petition relying on the ruling in Chantan v. Chakkapayyan Mathu (1). I was a party to that decision and after hearing the matter re-argued I see no reason to change my mind. It seems to me that the object of including the maintenance sections (Ch. 36) in the Criminal P. C., can only have been the prevention of destitution on public grounds; and that it should only be applied in cases where, in the absence of these provisions or the more cumbrous process of civil law, the wife or children would be destitute. Its unrestricted application to a society governed by a system of law like the Marumakatayam system is open to the peculiar objection and danger that it runs counter to the central i leas underlying the matriarchal system and should in my opinion only be allowed to the extent absolutely necessary to secure the object at which it is aimed. I would therefore dismiss the petition.

Napier, J.—This petition arises out of an order passed by the Subdivisional Magistrate of South Malabar, dismissing a petition by a certain Nair lady asking for an order for maintenance for her children against the respondent. The findings are that the petitioner is a Nair and has been observing the Marumakatayam system, that she began sambandam with the respondent in 1908-09 and between the years 1908 to 1917 four children were born, all of whom were to the respondent. The respondent denied the paternity, but the Magistrate has found it and I certainly accept that finding. The petitioner belongs to a tavazhi consisting of her mother, herself and her family and one Achutan Nair. The lower Court has not found what the income of the tavazhi is nor has it given any finding as to the income of the tarwad. All it finds is that the tavazhi lands are of some value and able to maintain the children, though not well. On this finding the Magistrate applies a decision of this Court in Chantan v. Chakkapayan Mathu (1) and holds that no order can be made. Chantan v. Chakkapayyan Mathu (1) entirely holds that the words "unable to maintain itself" mean "not having a right to be maintained." It is argued before us that this decision is wrong as being in conflict with other decisions of this Court, and it is pointed out that in the last reported case no one appeared for the petitioner. The question has now been fully re-argued before us and we have examined those cases. The first contention argued is that the section does not apply to persons following Marumakatayam law, as that is a special law within the meaning of S. 1, Criminal P. C. This view has been directly negatived in Ayya Patter v. Kaliani Ammal (2), Kariyadan Pokkar v. Kayat Beeran Kutti (3) and Venkatakrishna Patter v. Chimmukutti (4) and I have no doubt that those words in S. 1 have reference to statutory enactments and not to local family law.

I have therefore to consider whether apart from S. 1, Ch. 36 is applicable. In my opinion we must read the section in such a manner as to be properly applicable to the various social conditions of this country. The section is certainly old, as is to be found in the Act of 1861. But we have to bear in mind its origin. In so far as illegitimate children are concerned, it owes its origin to the old English Act, 7 and 8 Vic. C. 101, which gave a right to a woman either before or after the birth of her illegitimate child to apply for an order against the father, and it has been held that the origin of this law is the prevention of vagrancy.

Bearing this in mind I think that we should give a meaning to the words "unable to maintain itself" which is in keeping with the legal position of the parties who are affected. There is no doubt as to the position of the children of a sambandam in Malabar. That system of law is matriarchal and the children are entitled to be maintained by their tavazhi or tarwad. Whatever other rights they have there can be no doubt that in this respect the Marumakatayam system differs completely from the Hindu law in the rest of the Presidency, the Mahomedan law and the English law. I am therefore strongly inclined to think that the words "unable to maintain itself" cannot be confined, as suggested, to the tender age of the child but must also have reference to its financial dependency. This view seems to me to gain support from other words in the section. The first are the words almost directly after those words "a monthly allowance for the maintenance." That clearly points to the object of the payment which is to be ordered, and it seems to me that if the payment is not required for maintenance it necessarily follows that the payment should not be ordered. Then there are the words in S. 489, "change in the circumstances." If the words "child unable to maintain itself" had reference only to the tender age of the child, it seems to me that so wide a word as "circumstances" would not have been used in this latter section. If it is only a question of age a child cannot grow younger, it can only grow older, and that change can hardly be called a change of circumstances. The word is very applicable if a wider scope is intended. If, for instance, in this case the tavazhi lost all its money and there was nothing left for the child for maintenance, that would undoubtedly be a change of circumstances. In the same way if an order had originally been made in consequence of the poverty of the tavazhi and it was brought to the notice of the Court that the tavazhi had become possessed of wealth, that would be a change of circumstances. So far for the words of the section. Now for the cases.

(2) [1899] 22 Mad. 247=3 M. L. J. 281.=2 Weir 624.
(3) [1896] 19 Mad. 461=2 Weir 621.
(4) [1899] 22 Mad. 246=2 Weir 625.

The first is one of 1893 reported as Ayya Patter v. Paliani (2). That was also a case of sambandam between a Nair woman and a Brahmin. The Magistrate found that the tarwad was too poor to take the responsibility off the shoulders of the respondent, but he also held that the words in question had only reference to age. The revision petition was heard by Collins, C. J., and Shephard, J. The judgment however is very short. The Bench negatives the suggestion that the law enacted by the Code does not apply to Malabar and says that on the facts found there is no doubt that the order is right. The next case is Kariyadan Pokkar v. Kayat Beeran Kutti (3). The parties were Moplahs, but the Magistrate did not find whether they followed the Mahomedan or the Marumakatayam law. The Magistrate found that the defendant was willing to maintain the mother and the child if they lived with him, and on that finding held that no order could be made. The petition was heard by Collins, C. J., and Parker, J., and it appears that the complainant was the karnavan of the mother's tarwad and was acting as de facto guardian of the children. The Bench negatived the proposition that S. 488 did not apply to Malabar and held that S. 1 was not a bar to the petition. The learned Judges then formulated two questions: (1) Are the children legitimate or illegitimate children of the defendant; and (2) has he neglected or refused to maintain them. They decided nothing but raised the following question:

> "If the parties follow Marumakatayam law, the question will arise whether the father could be held to have neglected his duty to provide for his children if they were being actually maintained by the karnavan of their mother's tarwad who is bound by law to maintain them."

It seems to me that the Bench rather assumed that the words "unable to maintain itself" were not confined to the question of the tender age of the child. The next case is Venkatakrishna Pattar v. Chimmukutti (4) That was also a case of sambandam between persons governed by the Marumakatayam law. The Magistrate held that the petitioner, the mother, had no means of maintenance for her child and made an order against the father for Rs. 5 a month. The revision petition was heard by Collins, C. J. and Benson. J., and the judgment is as short as in Ayya Patter's case (2), which was expressly followed without any reference to Kariyadan Pokhar v. Kayat Beeran Kutti (3):

> "We have no doubt but that the Magistrate believed the woman and found that the petitioner before the High Court was the father of the child. He is therefore liable."

I certainly find it impossible to reconcile the wide language of this judgment with the doubts expressed in Kariyadan Pokkar v. Kayat Beeran Kutti (3) and I have little doubt that the learned Chief Justice took a strong view of the matter and that Parker, J., who sat with Collins, C. J., in the case reported as Kariyadan Pokkar v. Kayat Beeran Kutti (3) did not agree with him. The next case is In re Parathy Valappil Moideen (5). In that case the parties were Moplahs governed by Marumakatayam law. The petitioner had been divorced and was living in her own tarwad house with her children and it was assumed that they were being maintained. It was also found that the father was willing to take the boy and maintain him. The father petitioned this Court and the case was heard by Sadasiva Aiyar, J. He directly held that the inability referred to in the section relates to the absence of sufficient maturity of physical and mental development in the child rendering it in consequence unable to earn its living by its own efforts, and does not refor to inability through poverty or absence of means.

(5) [1913] 21 I. C. 469.

That this is the considered view of our learned brother has been demonstrated to us by the quotation of a decision of his as Chief Justice of the Travancore State which we have carefully considered. The last case is that reported as Chantan v. Chakkapayyan Mathu (1). There it was found that the children were in fact maintained by the tavazhi, but the Magistrate made the order. The petitioner applied to the High Court and his case was argued by a vakil, no one appearing for the mother. Abdur Rahim, J., in his judgment refers to the judgment of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., and says that he was unable to accept the narrow meaning of the words "unable to maintain itself" and holds that where the child is in fact maintained by some other person as of right, the section does not apply. The learned Judge also points out that the procedure is summary and does not cover the same ground as the civil liability of a father to maintain his child, and is of opinion that the legislature did not contemplate a summary order of this sort in a case where a child is well to do. He points out that in the case of Kariyadan Pokkar v. Kayat Beeran Kutti (3) the Bench did seem to suggest that children who were actually being maintained by their mother's tarwad were not entitled to maintenance. My learned brother concurred in this view.

On an examination of these cases there is no doubt that there ia a difference of opinion. Collins, C. J., seems to have taken a very strong view in two cases, but he was a party to Kariyadan Pokkar v. Kayat Beeran Kutti (3) where the opposite view was suggested. The decision of my learned brother Sadasiva Aiyar, J., is entitled to great respect, but it is the decision of a single Judge; whereas the decision in Kariyadan Pokkar v. Kayat Beeran Kutti (3) is that of a Bench. If I thought the latter decision was wrong I should have asked my learned brother to agree to its being referred to a Full Bench. But as on the policy of the provision and on the language of S. 1, I concur with the latter ruling, I would follow it and dismiss the petition. I would however point out that if the mother of the child can at any time show that the amount available from the tavazhi or possibly from the tarwad funds is insufficient to maintain the child it is open to her to renew her application.

The object of O. 41, R 33, is to enable an appellate Court to pass judgments or orders which would give consistency to its decisions and although the power to interefere with an order against a person who is not before it should be exercissd with great care and caution, the discretion of the Court to grant relief which benefits a party who has not appealed is not hampered. 28 *I. Y. Adiga—for Appellant.

T. V. Vencatramier—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The first question argued by Mr. Adiga is that as Rs. 10,000 was paid in furtherance of an agreement which fell through, that sum should not be regarded as having been paid in satisfaction of the common decree. The answer to this is that in the application for execution as regards the balance of Rs. 5,000 the Rs. 10,000 was referred to as having been paid in part satisfaction, and the present plaintiff did not object to this statement. It is not open to him now to contend that the Rs. 10,000 was not paid towards the decree. We must therefore uphold the order of the District Judge.

It was next objected that as the District Munsif passed several decrees against each of the defendants and as only some of them appealed against the decrees so passed, it was not competent to the District Judge to act under O. 41, R. 33, Civil P. C., in favour of the defendants who did not appeal. The language of the rule is wide enough to cover the case. The use of the two words "respondents" and "parties" shows that the legislature contemplated interference by the appellate Court even though some of the parties to the suit were not before it. This was the view taken in Venkatachela Pillai v. Ranga Pillai (1) and in Peria Krishnasami Naik v Aiyappa Naik (2). As against these cases, the learned vakil relied on the judgment of Kumaraswami Sastri, J., in Ramachandra Mallya v. Narayana Hegade (3). The learned Judge rightly enough points out that no decree should be passed against a person without hearing him; but we do not think that this principle is applicable where the party who is not heard is not prejudiced by the order but if benefited by it. The learned Judge relies upon the illustration to R. 33; but that illustration is not exhaustive of the scope of the rule. The very object of the rule is to enable a Court to pass judgments or orders which would give consistency to its decisions and although the power to interfere with the order against a person who is not before it should be exercised with great care and caution, there is no ground for introducing into the language of the rule words which would unnecessarily hamper the Court's discretion. We may also say that in the majority of cases where interference with a decree in favour of a person not before the Court is deemed necessary, the Court should implead him in the exercise of the plenary powers possessed by it, so that the benefit of the decree may be availed of in execution. We think the order of the District Judge is right and dismiss the second appeal with costs.

K. Ramachandra Aiyar—for Appellant.

M. D. Devadoss—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The decree under execution was passed on 2nd March 1905. The present application for execution was made on 4th October 1917, clearly more than 12 years after the date of the decree. The question is whether the bar is saved by the operation of Cl. (2), S 48, Civil P.C. The lower appellate Court held in favour of the decree-holder. Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar for the appellant contended, first, that the respondent is barred by res judicata from presenting the application under execution On 11th April 1917 the decree-holder applied to the Court to allow him to convert an execution application filed by him for the arrest of the judgment-debtor into one for the attachment of his property. In the appellate Court it was held that the application to amend was a fresh application and that in that view it was barred by limitation. The learned vakil contends that it was open to the decree-holder to have pleaded in that application that he was prevented by force or fraud from filing his application earlier and that this failure operates as res judicata now. Even granting that to execution applications all the disabilities which attach to a plaintiff failing to plead are applicable, we are clear that, when an applicant wants his application to be treated as one in time, it cannot be said that he ought to have pleaded that there was fraud or force which prevented him from applying in time. We overrule this contention.

The second point was that the fraud which was pleaded in extenuation of the failure to apply in time was a long time anterior to the date of the last application and that consequently the decree holder is not entitled to the benefit of Cl. (2), S. 48. Even granting that the rigid test insisted on by Shephard, J., in Seshachalam Chetti v. Rajam Chetty (1) is the proper one, we are of opinion that the application to arrest the judgment-debtor on 14th February 1916 satisfied that test. The matter was not disposed of till March 1917. Further in Venkayya v. Raghavacharlu (2) impliedly and in Abdul Khadir v. Ajiyar Ahammad (3) Sundara Aiyar expressedly did not act on the view taken by Shephard, J. We are inclined to agree with the view taken in the later cases. We are supported by Moshin Ali v. Masoom Ali (4) in our conclusion. We think the lower appellate Court is right and dismiss Civil Miscellaneous Second Appeal No. 6 of 1919 with costs and Civil Miscellaneous Second Appeal No. 7 of 1919 without costs.

Judgment.—The question whether a woman can get puja performed in a temple by a proper proxy is now settled by the ruling ef the Full Bench in Annaya Tantri v. Ammaka Hengsu (1). The appellant contends that the plaintiff's choice of proxy must be limited to the other sharers who were entitled to perform puja in their turn. This was put as a matter of special custom in the plaint temple in the lower appellate Court, but that Court has found against it and we must accept the finding. It is now argued before us that it is a rule of Hindu law. Colebrook's Digest, Book 2, Ch. 3, S. 2, R. 21. is relied on. We do not think that rule has anything to do with the choice of proxies at all; nor is it shown to be in force in this Presidency. The second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Where a decree-holder attaches a decree held by his judgment-debtor and an application by the latter for entering up satisfaction of such decree is opposed by the attaching creditor on the ground that it is collusive and fraudulent, the onus lies on him to prove the fraud, and not on the judgment-debtor to prove the bona fides of the certificate. [P 199 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908) O. 21, Rr. 2 and 3—Court seised of application to enter up satisfaction—Inquiry must be made—Grant of permission to withdraw justifies revision

When once a Court is seised of an application to enter up satisfaction of a decree it is bound to make an inquiry and see whether the decree has been satisfied, and it will not be justified in allowing the application to be withdrawn. [P 199 C 1]

The permission to withdraw in such a case is a grave irregularity warranting the interference of the High Court in revision. [P 199 C 2]

Where injustice is done in the exercise of jurisdiction the High Court should interfere.

Judgment. — Although the point argued is not free from difficulty and I have a doubt whether S. 115, Civil P. C., is applicable to the case, I shall express my opinion fully so that if the matter be taken in appeal it can be properly dealt with then. The petitioners in this case are the judgment-debtors in Original Suit No. 333 of 1912. One Rangaswami Reddi obtained in a small cause suit a decree against the decree-holder in Original Suit No. 333 of 1912 and attached the decree in the latter suit. That was in August 1914. In December 1915 the decree-holder in Original Suit No. 333 of 1912 applied to the District Munsif's Court to enter up satisfaction of his decree. At this time the attachment at the instance of the decree-holder in the small cause suit had been effected. This application for satisfaction being entered up was opposed by the attaching decree-holder. In consequence of the opposition by the attaching creditor the decree-holder in Original Suit No. 333 of 1912 withdrew the application. The attachment proceedings were allowed to continue.

I find from the papers that notice was served upon defendant 1 in Original Suit No. 333 of 1912, the father of the petitioners, and that he stated in person that the decree was satisfied. In these circumstances it was the duty of the attaching decree-holder to have adduced evidence to show that the decree was not satisfied. I cannot accede to the contention of Mr. Muthia Mudaliar that the burden of proving the bona fides of the certificate is upon the judgment-debtor who said that he had paid the money and the decree-holder who said that he had received the money; and in these circumstances it is upon persons, who allege that the certificate was collusive and was intended to defraud them, to adduce evidence to establish the facts. The District Munsif and in appeal the District Judge have come to the conclusion that as the application for satisfaction was withdrawn it is not open to the petitioners to plead that the decree in Original Suit No. 333 of 1912 was satisfied. The learned vakil for the petitioners drew my attention to O. 21, R. 2, Cls. 1 and 3.

The first clause makes it the duty of the decree-holder to certify the payment, and when that application is before the Court the Court is directed to record satisfaction. Cl. 3 says that a payment or adjustment which has not been certified or recorded shall not be recognized by the executing Court thereby implying that if there is either a certificate by the decree-holder or the recording of satisfaction by the Court, the executing Court is bound to take notice of the fact. The decision in Tarak Nath Sarkar v. Natabar Mondal (1), which I respectfully follow, holds that a mere certificate is enough to enable the judgment-debtor to plead that the decree has been satisfied. As myself and Kumaraswami Sastri, J., held in Lodd Govinda Doss v. Rajah of Karvetnagar (2), when once a Court is seised of an application to enter up satisfaction, it is bound to make an enquiry and see whether the decree has been satisfied. I do not think that the Court will be justified under the circumstances in allowing the application to be withdrawn.

It seems to me that in this case the Courts below ought to have made an inquiry whether the application to enter up satisfaction was made bona fide and whether the payment allsged to have been made by the judgment-debtor to the decree-holder in Original Suit No. 333 of 1912 was actually made. In my opinion this is an irregularity which will warrant the interference of this Court under S. 115, Civil P. C. What the Courts below have done is practically to refuse to exercise the powers given to them under O. 21, R 2. That would amount to a refusal to exercise the jurisdiction vested in them. I am free to confess that S. 115 can be invoked in this case. Some Judges may hold that this is straining the language of S. 115. I have always held that wherever there is injustice done in the exercise of jurisdiction, the High Court should interfere. Therefore I incline to the view that S. 115 is applicable to this case. I would reverse the orders of the Courts below and send the case back to the District Munsif for proper inquiry regarding the question whether the payment was really made by the judgment-debtor to the decree-holder in Original Suit No. 333 of 1912, and if so whether there was any subsisting interest capable of being attached by the attaching decree-holder. Costs will abide the result

v.

A V. Tirumala Row Sahib—Defendant.

Civil Suit No. 278 of 1917, Decided on 27th February 1918.

Contract Act (1872), S. 74—"Penal"—Meaning explained—Agreement by borrower in return for smaller sum to repay larger one on given day representing principal and interest is not penal.

An agreement by a borrower, in return for a smaller sum to repay a larger one on a given day representing the original principal and interest, is not contrary to law [P 202 C 1]

In such a case the Court cannot award relief under S. 74 as the transaction is not penal in its nature: Willingford v. Mutual Society, (1880) 5 A. C. 685, Foll; 13 I.C. 853, Diss. from.

"The word "penal" in S. 74 has a bearing only when there is a main contract and a subsidiary contract providing for some more drastic consequences in the event of the breach of the original and main contract It is totally inapplicable to a term of the original contract or consequence of the original contract not owing to breach but owing to fulfilment. [P 201 C 1,2]

Defendant executed a pro-note to plaintiff for Rs. 10,000 promising to repay the amount with interest at 24 per cent. per annum. On the same day he gave a letter to plaintiff in which he agreed to discharge the said loan by monthly payments of Rs. 500, for which he executed 20 hundis, one to be cashed each month. The amount paid by plaintiff in cash was only Rs. 6,000. In a suit to enforce the pro-note:

Held: that the transaction, though oppressive, was not penal within the meaning of S. 74, Contract Act. [P 201 C 2]

V. Ramesam—for Defendant.

Judgment.—This is a suit on a promissory note and an equitable mortgage of properties securing it. The plaintiff is a Sowcar and the defendant is the Jagirdar of Arni represented by the manager of his estate as his guardian. It is an estate under the Court of Wards and his interests are represented by Mr. V. Ramesam, the Government Pleader. The contract is this: It is a promissory note, dated 18th July 1915, in the ordinary form for Rs. 10,000.

"On demand I promise to pay Sukkulal Sowcar or order at Madras, the sum of rupees ten thousand only with interest at 24 per cent per annum for value received in cash."

That is the promissory note and that is accompanied by two other contemporaneous documents one of which is not of very great importance, because it only shows what was done, which I am going to describe presently. The other is a letter signed by the defendant in which he says this:

"I have this day borrowed and received from you the sum of Rs. 10,000 upon the equitable mortgage of the stable No. 2110 Madaran Paracherry, Egmore, Madras, for the repayment of the amount of the promissory note payable on demand with interest at 24 per cent. per annum. I have this day executed for the repayment of the amount of the said promissory note, 20 hundis of Rs. 500 each authorizing you to cash each hundi every month on the due date and credit the sum so realized towards the said pro-note. If the amount of the said hundis is not paid by me you are at liberty to proceed against me for the recovery of the amount of the said hundis and credit the same on footing of the said promissory note".

And then a document is executed which shows what was done. There was paid Rs. 4,500 in cash and a balance of Rupees 1,500 outstanding on an old promissory note of 1914 was wiped out. The remaining Rs. 4,000 is described in this way:

"Paid interest for 20 months in respect of the promissory note for Rs. 10,000 dated this day on condition of repayment of the amount of the said pro-note by monthly instalments of Rs. 500 for which 20 hundis of Rs. 500 each and executed this day in your favour'

This is the transaction on the documents. One has to see what the real transaction was. Treating the extinction of the old promissory note as cash, he did not get Rs. 10,000 at all, but only Rs. 6,000, and he agreed to pay all the interest on Rs. 10,000 to treat that as paid in advance, and to repay Rs. 10,000 by 20 hundis of Rs. 500 each. So that on the face of it at best he got a loan of Rs. 6,000 with an obligation to repay Rs. 10,000 in 20 months which worked out at something like 40 per cent, and not 24 per cent, as described in the contract. But there are two other features about this matter which make the interest, though it would require an expert mathematician to work it out, very much more oppressive than that. In the first place, but for the payment of the interest as a whole in advance, the defendant would have had the advantage of having in his hands all the interest at any given time which remained unpaid. If he paid it as stipulated he would have the use of it for the whole ol the gradually diminishing period during the 20 months instead of the user passing forthwith to the plaintiff. In the second place, while he is paying—consider that the interest was paid at the end instead of at the beginning—month by month Rs. 200, in fact what he is doing is to pay a consolidated interest on the total which is in fact constantly diminishing. So that every month he is in fact paying a higher rate of interest because, whereas he pays on Rs. 10,000 for the first month, the next month he pays off Rs. 500 and still pays interest on Rs. 10,000 although the captial has been reduced by the payment of Rs. 500 and so on. That will have the effect of spreading a little more interest over smaller sums and the rate of interest will increase until you get the astounding result in the last month that he pays Rs. 200 for the month's use of Rs. 500 which works out at very nearly 500 per cent. In this state of things the question I have to consider is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to enforce this contract as it stands, or whether there is any provision of law which enables me to give relief to the defendant. It is an unconscionable bargain but I have not got a Money-lenders Act to give relief against a bargain merely because it is oppressive and catching and no plea has been raised here of undue influence or pressure or anything of that kind. So that the sole question I have to ask myself is: Is there any provision of law administered in this country that enables me to attack or give relief against this transaction? I need hardly say that if I possibly could I would have done so.

The first way in which Mr. Ramesam puts his case is that put down in his pleadings. He says this case comes under S. 74, Contract Act, being penal. I asked him what was penal. He said what is penal is to treat a loan of Rs. 6,000 as a loan of Rs. 10,000 and make the interest payable in advance. I think that both the English and the Indian Courts have finally established the principle that the word penal or penalty has a bearing, as Ayling, J., puts it, only when there is a main contract and a subsidiary contract providing for some more drastic consequences in the event of the breach of the original and main contract. That seems to me what is meant by penalty, and I do not think anything can be brought under the operation of S. 74 which is a term and stipulation of the main contract between the parties. A common instance of such a penal stipulation is the familiar one that on failure of payment of one instalment the whole shall become due. That is the penalty for the breach of what the contracting party has undertaken to do. Against such penalties the Courts can, if they choose, give relief. But it seems to me that the word penalty is totally inapplicable to a term of the original contract or consequence of the original contract not owing to breach but owing to fulfilment, and what Mr. Ramesam complains against is not in consequence of the breach but in consequence of the fulfilment of the contract; if I fulfil this contract according to its tenor, he says, these are the consequences and these I say are penal. They may be oppressive, but in my opinion they are not penal within the meaning of the Contract Act and the decided cases.

In relation to this a decision of Sir Basil Scott and Bachelor, J., Velchand Chhaganlal v. A. Flagg (1), was referred to. It does certainly appear from the decree there that where a larger sum was recited to have been lent—Rs. 6,000—but in fact by the deduction of interest a smaller sum was lent, the Court undoubtedly seems to have treated the loan in its judgment as being a loan for the lesser amount. There is no report of the arguments and the judgment gives no reasons whatever for the result arrived at and does not discuss the matter in the least. All I can say is that the result of the case which is apparently embodied in the headnote is one that is absolutely unintelligible to me. No reasons, as I say are given and it is not necessary for me to say that I think the case is wrongly decided. I can only say that as reported, it is absolutely unintelligible and I see that my brother Ayling in Suryadevara Seetaramayya v. Suryadevara Katayya (2) made similar observations with regard to this very same case at p. 114. I therefore think that it is impossible to give relief under this contract to the defendant under S. 74.

Mr. Ramesam puts forward a most ingenious argument and one which if I thought verged on soundness I should certainly give effect to. It is this. All through—neglect the fact that I paid interest at the start—I was paying interest on money which I had not got because the moment I paid off Rs. 500 for the first hundi there was only Rs. 9,500 to pay interest on but I paid interest on Rs. 10,000 and so on until the capital has gone to Rs. 500 and the interest is still on Rs. 10,000, that is, quoad Rs. 9,500 as it was discharged there was total failure of consideration. I think he wants me to go so far as to say that the whole stipulation to pay interest was vitiated by that feature. It seems to me that you cannot break up this contract into bits and treat each monthly payment as a separate contract. It seems to me that the contract is indivisible. I do not think it can reasonably be described as a loan of Rs. 10,000 —I think in truth it is a loan of Rs. 6 000 with an agreement to pay Rs. 500 a month which goes in reduction of principal and interest until the sum of Rs. 10,000 has been paid off.

Whether you regard one particular portion of it as re payment of interest and another as re-payment of principal does not matter. I think there is no law in this country which either forbids such a transaction or allows a Court to give relief against it. It simply is a re-payment of Rs. 10,000 spread over a certain period in return for a loan of Rs. 6,000 and I am totally unable to see that there is anything illegal or improper about such a matter according to the law of this country and I think that the well known observations of Lord Hatherley in Wallingford v. Mutual Society (3) apply, where in a decision before the Money-lenders Act in English and after the repeal of the Usury Acts the House of Lords held that an agreement in return for a smaller sum to repay a larger one on a given day representing the original principal and interest was not contrary to law. I must hold the same with regard to this agreement and I must give judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed with costs and interest at the contract rate till the date of plaint and 6 per cent thereafter. Usual mortgage decree. Time six months. Plaintiff must give credit to the defendant for the payment already made.

ABDUR RAHIM AND SESHAGIRI AIYAR, JJ.

Munnavaru Begam Sahibu—Plaintiff —Appellant.

v.

Mir Mahapalli Sahib aud others—Defendants—Respondents.

Appeal No. 64 of 1917, Decided on 20th March 1918, against decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Masulipatam, in Original Suit No. 71 of 1908, D/- 11th August 1916.

Mahomedan Law—Wakf—Woman can be head of mujavar of astana.

Under Mahomedan law it is not incompetent for a woman to be a head mujavar of an astana.

Per Abdur Rahim, J. — Excepting for local usages and customs to the contrary, there is no general provision of Mahomedan law against a woman specializing in any form of religious teaching and propagating any doctrines of Mahomedan religion, either of orthodox Mahomedan religion or of Sufi-ism. The disability of woman to hold a religious office arises from certain local usages and customs and not by any absolute injunction of Mahomedan law. A religious office can be held by a woman unless there are duties of a religious nature which she cannot perform in person or by deputy, the burden of establishing which is on those who plead the exclusion, and in the absence of anything in the rules by the founder, the usage of the institution governs the case. [P 205 C 1]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—Except in cases of grants given for the express purpose of performing religious duties which are dependent on personal or sex capacity, there is no reason why a female, whether Hindu or Mahomedan, should be disentitled to perform those duties. Wherever there are profits which are payable to an heir in the discharge of duties appertaining to a religious office, it must be taken as a general rule, subject to some exceptions, that women are competent to inherit these offices and to perform the duties appertaining to them. [P 207 C 1]

T. Ramchandra Rao—for Appellant.

P. Nagabushanam—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—The appeal is by plaintiff 3, daughter of plaintiff 1, who died since the institution of the suit. The suit was to recover certain lands which are attached to what is described in the plaint as the Astana Bara Imam at Inuguduru, a suburb of Masulipatam, from the defendants who are in possession. Plaintiff 3's case is that she is entitled to the office of Head Mujavar of the Astana in succession to her mother, plaintiff 1. What is the nature of the institution is one of the important questions we have to consider in the appeal. There was a grant made by Nizam-ul-Mulk, Nizam of Hyderabad, in 1725, which is the root of the title of the parties, and one of the questions for consideration is as to the true interpretation of that document. The grant is in Persian, and when properly translated the material portions of it are to this effect. It purports to confirm previous grants by ancient rulers made by way of Madad-Mash, or (literally translated) subsistence allowance of Mir Ali Akbar and others, sons of Mir Syed Mahomed Madani, who are to recite Darood or blessings on the Prophet and Fatiha in the name of the Imams and the martyrs, the descendants of the Prophet. Then it gees on to say:

"It is necessary that the said lands should be left in the possession of the aforesaid persons so that they should utilize the incomes thereof towards their maintenance and along with their descendants, literally children and grandchildren (aulad and ahfad), should engage themselves in offering prayers for the perpetuity of the State."

If the matter stood merely upon the interpretation of this document, it might be contended that the grant was in absolute terms to the persons mentioned therein, Mir Ali Akbar and others, sons of Mir Syed Mahomedan Madani, who were expected to perform certain religious ceremonies. Upon such an interpretation the grant would be of an absolute estate to the persons named in the sanad. But the evidence clearly shows that the parties concerned have put their own interpretation upon the document and the practice and usage has been in accordance with that interpretation. That is to say, they have treated the grant as creating a public religious trust for the performance of Fatiha and certain other ceremonies during the Muharram, and though it might be possible to hold that the grant was of an absolute estate to Mir Ali Akbar and others, sons of Mir Syed Mahomed Madani, I am not prepared to say that the parties' interpretation of the sanad as creating a wakf is unreasonable. In any case, so far as this appeal is concerned we must proceed upon that interpretation, for it is upon it that the parties base their claim.

Both the parties are descendants of Mir Syed Mahomed Madani's sons and they are, according to the interpretation placed by themselves on the grant entitled to allowances for maintenance, provided they keep up and perform the religious duties mentioned in the sanad. There has been previous litigation with respect to rights of the parties, some time in 1869, when a suit was instituted by the father of defendants 1 and 2 in the present suit against plaintiff 1 and another lady. That suit was compromised and a decree passed in the terms of the Rajinama marked Ex. B. By that compromise it was provided that:

"defendant 2 (that is the mother of the appellant) should be Head Mujavar henceforward, the plaintiff should give up the remaining lands for which he had brought the suit in excess heretofore and the part produce, etc. . . . . business should be carried on from generation to generation (not lineally as wrongly translated in the paper book) according to the terms of this agreement."

There cannot be any doubt that if this Rajinama is binding on the parties, the appellant is entitled to the office of Head Mujavar. This is what has been held by the lower Courts and is undoubtedly in accordance with the correct interpretation of Ex. B. The lower Court however is of opinion that Ex. B is in violation of or contrary to the provisions of the sanad already referred to (Ex. 6) and cannot bind the parties; and that we have therefore to fall back on the terms of the sanad and in the light of the general Mahomedan law to ascertain whether the plaintiff or the defendant is entitled to the office of Head Mujavar. The use of the words Astana and Mujavar prima facie indicates as if there was a shrine or tomb of some holy person which had to be kept up by the endowment. But the evidence shows that these words are used merely to indicate a sort of place in the form of a raised platform where a "Panja" and a "Peer" (staffs which are carried about in a Muharram procession) is planted and where certain ceremonies in connexion with the Muharram are performed. There is no evidence to show that there is any tomb of any well-known Sufi or fakir where any initiation of fakirs takes place, as may be the case in some Khankah or Astanad. If we look to the pleadings of the parties, there can be no doubt that all the religious ceremonies which are performed at the place called Astana Bara Imam are in connexion with Muharram, and the defendants in their written statement never alleged that any Sufi or other doctrines are propigated at this place or any fakirs are initiated into any particular order or brotherhood. It was by the words Astana or Mujavar that the Subordinate Judge who originally tried the case as well as the learned Judge against whose judgment this appeal has been preferred, were misled into thinking that there were some particular religious teachings associated with this so called Astana. Then unfortunately when the matter came up on a previous occasion before this Court, arguments were addressed on the assumption that there might possibly be certain ceremonies connected with this institution which a woman was not capable of performing. In order to ascertain if this was so, the appeal was remanded to the lower Court for inquiry into this matter. As was to be expected, some of the defendants have now put forward some sort of evidence suggesting that initiation of fakirs actually takes place in this institution in order to make out that the appellant is not fit to be at its head.

The evidence however is that by "fakirs" all that is meant is some persons, Hindus or Mahomedans, who are engaged to carry in the procession the "Panja" and the "Peer" during the ten days of the Muharram. That is to say, these so called fakirs are no more than persons taking part in a Muharram procession.

It is not suggested, nor could it well be, that these men have to be initiated into any particular doctrines or they have to perform any ceremonies requiring particular religious status. To describe such a state of things as equivalent to initiation into a religious brotherhood is absolute misuse of words. So is the use of the words Astana and Head Mujavar in this case, for these terms properly used are connected with institutions for the upkeep of a shrine of a reputed saint or for the teaching of certain doctrines connected with Sufi ism. The evidence amply makes out that the parties are absolutely illiterate and know nothing about any religious order or any religious teaching connected with any brotherhood of fakirs, properly so called. The duties connected with this Astana are nothing more than the organizing and carrying out of certain processions in which the Hindus, according to the evidence, participate equally with the Mahomedan, of the locality.

Many authorities have been quoted to us in connexion with the question whether a woman can properly be a Head Mujavar of an Astana or not. None of those cases or authorities call for any serious consideration, having regard to the fact that there is no Astana in the proper sense of the word and the Mujavar's duties are only purely of a secular character so far as the evidence shows. We can take it to be the law, as laid down by the Privy Council in the case of Shahoo Banoo v. Aga Mahomed Jaffer Bindaneem (1), that if the religious duties connected with a religious office are such that a woman cannot properly discharge in person or by deputy, then she cannot be appointed to that office. The well-known cases referred to relate to the office of Sajjadanashins of certain Khankabs and also of Mujavar of certain shrines. The word "Mujavar" literally means a sweeper or the person who cleans the place, but it is conventionally used to denote a person who is looking after a shrine or tomb of a holy person, generally called Astana. "Astana" is a word which is often used to denote a place inspiring respect and reverence. It need not necessarily indicate a tomb or shrine, though in popular use it indicates a shrine or tomb of a holy person. The term Sajjadanashin or Gaddinashin is conventionally used to denote the person in charge of a Khankah or an institution where religious enthusiasts and fakirs congregate and where the superior or the head of the institution has certain doctrines of Sufi-ism to teach. But there is absolutely nothing in connexion with Astana Bara Imam which has anything in common either with a Khankah or an Astana properly so called. That a woman cannot be a Sajjadanashin may, for the present case, be taken to be sound law, if the duties involve the teaching of certain doctrines to fakirs, necessitating her coming into daily contact with them. It is not however the fact that a woman cannot be a Sufi or that she is not competent to teach the tenets of Sufi-ism. Sufi-ism, as a school of Mahomedan religion is equally open to men and women. But having regard to the custom and usage of the country by which women observe seclusion, it is not ordinarily to be expected that women could satisfactorily perform the duties connected with the head of an institution like Khankah which would bring her into contact with fakirs and other men not being her own close relations. Excepting for this local usage and custom I am not aware of any general provision of Mahomedan law against a women specializing in any form of religious teaching and propagating any doctrines of the Mahomedan religion, either of orthodox Mahomedan religion or of Sufi-ism. The rule prohibiting women from being appointed to such offices is not confined to the office of Sajjanadashin, but there may be other offices which she may not be able to perform, for instance, that of an Imam in a mosque where she would have to lead the congregation. At any rate in practice women are not known to have officiated as Imams in mosques any more than Christian women are known to have officiated as priests or clegry in Christian churches. It is not necessary for us to consider in this case the extent of the application of the rule precluding the appointment of women to an office like that of Sajjadanashin and the limitations of such a rule. So far as I have been able to trace the history of the question, it had its origin in certain passages in Macnaghten's Principles and Precedents of Mahomedan Law, p. 332. It is stated there:

"Females are not competent to assume the office of superior of an endowment and such an act is at variance with the usages of the country, because it is the duty of the superior to instruct and guide his disciples, to teach his scholars, and to keep their company continually, in private and in public, and this cannot be done with propriety by a woman, whose duty it is to live retired and secluded."

I think that seems to be a perfectly reasonable proposition so long as it is understood that the prohibition or the disability arises from certain local usages and customs and not by any absolute injunction of Mahomedan religion or law. Mr. Ameer Ali in stating the law on the subject at p. 443, Edn. 4, Vol. 1, of his Mahomedan Law, states it in similar terms. He also bases it on custom and not on any rule of Mahomedan theology or canonical law, which has in fact very little to do with Sufi-ism, Khankahs and Astanas. One of the earliest decisions on the subject is to be found in Shah Imam Buksh v. Mt. Beebee Shahee (2). There the learned Judges of the Sadder Diwany Adawlut rely upon the passage in Macnaghten already recited as authority for the proposition in question. There are also some rulings of the Madras High Court on the point: Hussain Beebee v. Hussain Sherif (3). Mujavar Ibrambibi v. Mujavar Husain Sherif (4). In Mujavar Ibrambibi v. Mujavar Hussain Sheriff (4) what is laid down is that a woman is not competent to perform the duties of Mujavar of a Durga which are not of a secular nature. What the learned Judges say is that it was established by evidence that the office of Mujavar entailed the discharge of duties of a spiritual character, such as reading the Fatiha, offering prayers and incense, etc., which could not conveniently be performed by a woman, and that there was no satisfactory evidence that the office had ever been held by a woman. Apart from what the special evidence in that case was, I do not think the learned Judges meant to lay down a general proposition that any religious office which entails the performance of Fatiha and other prayers or the offering of incense could not be performed by women, for I do not think they could have meant that Fatiha, which consists in reciting certain Suras of the Koran, could not be said by women and that a woman could not say prayers according to the Mahomedan religion. Such a proposition would be incorrect; and apart from the special facts of that particular case, I cannot accept the decision as laying down any such general rules of law as contended for.

In Hussain Beebee v. Hussain Sherif (3) it was held that according to Mahomedan law a woman may manage the temporal affairs of a mosque, but not the spiritual affairs connected with it, the management of the latter requiring peculiar personal qualifications. There the institution to which the office in dispute related was called Shakh Fareed Shukkurgunj Mosque. If it was a mosque in its proper and ordinary sense of the word, that is, a place where prayers are said by Mahomedans, then there are no duties connected with it which a woman could not perform, at least through a deputy. But from the evidence in this case and from what we have noticed in other cases, we know that the word "mosque" or "musjid" is applied to all sorts of places may be a mere tomb or an Imam Bara. The learned Judges in dealing with the law in Hussain Bebee v. Hussain Sherif (3) cite cases connected with the office of Guddeenishin. If that was the real nature of the institution, probably it was from the name, it might have been a replica of the tomb or a shrine containing some relics of that well known saint. In that case it would perhaps properly be called a Durga. Ths report does not give what the actual duties were in connexion with the office then in question, and if the office required any peculiar personal qualifications which might be wanting in a woman, that is to say duties which could not be performed by her either personally or through a proxy then undoubtedly the decision was right. The facts do not appear sufficiently fully to enable me to say what the exact scope of that decision is. On the other hand I entirely agree with a recent decision of this Court in Imam Bee v. Molla Khasim Sahib (5), that a religious office can be held by a woman unless there are duties of a religious nature which she cannot perform in person or by deputy and the burden of establishing that a woman is precluded from holding a particular office is on those who plead the exclusion and in the absence of anything in the rules by the founder, the usage of the institution governs the case. In that case the office was that of a mujavar in a mosque. I believe the duties attached to the office were simply those of a muttawali, though the word used there is mujavar. In this Presidency the word "mujavar" is not seldom used in the sense of muttawali of an ordinary religious trust.

Here the appellant, as a member of the family of the descendants of Mir Ali Akbar and his brother, is admittedly entitled to certain allowance by way of maintenance, and she does not dispute that the defendants are also entitled to similar allowance. The dispute is solely about the office of Head Mujavar in virtue of which she claims to be entitled to possession of the property in dispute, that is the lands of the institution concerned. As Head Mujavar she would also be entitled to an additional share of the income. The Subordinate Judge in my opinion was entirely wrong in holding that the compromise was in valuation of the terms of the sanad and therefore could not be given effect to. He has also gone wrong in thinking that the appellant is disqualified to hold the office she claims. The evidence clearly shows that this was never the consciousness of the parties, in fact the consciousness of the parties themselves was just the other way. Before the appellant her mother held the office and the written statement never raised any doubt as to the competency of the appellant to hold the office on the ground of sex, if she was not precluded from holding it, as alleged, by the terms of the sanad. I reverse the decree of the Subordinate Judge and there will be a decree in favour of plaintiff 3 giving her possession of the property in dispute. The Subordinate Judge will inquire into the mesne profits she is entitled to from the date of suit to the date when she obtains possession under the decree. The respondents will pay plaintiff 3's costs in this and the lower Court and they will also pay the court-fee payable to Government.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J. — I entirely agree. In a very recent reference to the Full Bench which I made in conjunction with Napier, J., I went fully into the question of the capacity of a Hindu female to succeed to religious offices and to discharge the duties of those offices. I am glad to find that my learned brother's exposition of the Mahomedan law is in complete accordance with my views with regard to the position of Hindu women. Except in cases of grants given for the express purpose of performing religious duties which are dependent on personal or sex capacity, I fail to see why a female whether Hindu or Mahomedan, should be disentitled to perform those duties. In the language of the Judicial Committee in Shaboo Banoo v. Agha Mahomed Jaffer Bindaneem (1), a woman holding an office of a religious trust, which by its nature involves no spiritual duties such as a woman could never properly discharge in person or by deputy, is competent to hold such an office. Or it may be, as in the case in Mohan Lalaji v. Madhsudan Lala (6), that the peculiar doctrines of a sect may preclude women married into a different sect from performing the duties of the temple or religious institution belong to the former sect. Except in these two classes of cases, in my opinion there is no warrant for holding that women are incompetent to inherit a religious office connected with a religious institution. It has always been held that in the case of secular duties pertaining to a religious trust, women are competent to perform them. For example as my learned brother has pointed out, the muttawaliship in a Mahomedan mosque can be held by women. So also it has been held in the Dhuncooverbai v. Advocate-General (7) that a mohuntship can be held by a female. Whereover there are profits which are payable to an heir in the discharge of duties appertaining to a religious office, it must be taken as a general rule, subject to some exceptions, that women are competent to inherit those offices and to perform the duties appertaining to them.

In the present case the course of devolution and the way in which the parties have been enjoying show that women have been held competent to discharge the duties pertaining to this particular Astana. As my learned brother has pointed out, the original grant confers an absolute right in the property. I am inclined to think that its dedication as a wakf must have been by the successors of the original grantee. Anyway there can be no doubt that the duties connected with the Astana were mostly secular. As has just been pointed out, the way in which Hindus and Mahomedans have initiated into Fakirship during the Muharram shows that there are really no religious duties to be performed by the Head Mujavar. And further in my opinion the parties are bound by the compromise, as the matter had been litigated in a competent Court and the parties agreed that plaintiff 1 and her descendants are entitled from generation to generation to the Head Mujavarship. The Subordinate Judge seems to think that this compromise is not consistent with the original sanad. I fail to see how there is any inconsistency between the sanad and the compromise. Even if there were any inconsistencies, I am not prepared to say that the compromise is not binding upon the parties and upon those who claim under the parties to the compromise.

And lastly I would say that the fact that in the written statement no objection is taken to plaintiff 3 succeeding to the Head Mujavarship on the ground of her being a female is clear evidence that in the opinion of the litigants and of their co-religionists women are not incompetent to perform the duties of Head Mujavarship. For these reasons, I entirely agree with the conclusion arrived at by my learned brother.

Civil Appeal No. 220 of 1917, Decided on 20th August 1918, from decree of Temporary Sub. Judge., Chingleput, in Original Suit No 12 of 1916.

Easement — Water rights — Irrigation of lands from Government tank — Lands already under cultivation have preferential rights to supply over waste lands subsequently brought under cultivation.

In the case of lands irrigated by a Government tank, the owners of wet lands have a preferential right to the supply of water in seasons when the tank connot yield the normal supply over the assignees of waste lands which were subsequently brought under cultivation.

[P 203 C 1]

V. Ramesam—for Appellant.

T. Narasimha Aiyangar—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the Secretary of State against the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Chingleput granting the Mirasidars of the village of Damal certain preferential rights in regard to the water supply of their lands. The suit of the Mirasidars was based on the allegation that, as Mirasidars, they were entitled to certain immemorial rights. In this Court the claim was limited to easement rights arising from long use of the water of the channel and of the tank.

There are two sources of irrigation for the village. One is a Kasam or spring channel taking its source in the North Arcot District and irrigating solely the fields in Damal. In regard to this channel it was admitted by the learned Government Pleader that the Mirasidars of the village have all along been maintaining it in proper condition. The other source of irrigation is the tank. The Kasam or the channel passes along the northern bund of this tank. During the flood season when the tank is full the channel does not appear as a separate source of irrigation. But during the major portion of the year it is distinct from the tank and irrigates certain lands exclusively. When the tank is full no question of preferential right can arise. It is only when water goes below a particular level that difficulties are felt about the water supply. It was conceded that when there is the normal rainfall no difficulty is felt throughout the year in irrigating all the fields properly. But during the years when the rainfall is below the average, which happens only once in ten years or more, the question arises as to which of the fields in the village should have a priority of water supply. It is common ground that originally the village had only 520 acres of cultivable land, which were divided into about 163 shares among the Mirasidars of the village. In addition to these lands the Mirasidars had also some Samudayam lands, the income of which was shared by them in proportion to their holding. There was a long tract of unassigned waste in the beginning. These lands were subsequently assigned by Government on Darkhast. These have been technically known as Kaipath lands as opposed to the Pangu lands, which term denoted the 520 acres already referred to. At first the Mirasidars had practically all the waste lands assigned to them. We find in the year 1860 the total average of these lands was about 730 acres. Since then further assignments have been made and the present Ayacut of the village is nearly 2,500 acres. In these circumstances it seems to us that the presumption is the owners of the lands which were originally wet acquired a preferential right to water supply over lands which were subsequently brought under cultivation.

Looking at the question from another point of view the same result follows. Mr. Narasimha Aiyangar, in his very clear analysis of the nature of the cultivation in this village, drew our attention to the following facts. There are five blocks of land into which the original Pangu lands were divided. The blocks were known as Thenkazhani Keezhkazhani, Velangadu, Perithipattu and Puthucherry. In Thenkazhani which is more favourably situated than the other blocks, there are about a hundred acres of double crop lands. The first crop cultivation in this block begins in or about April and is harvested in September. The second crop begins in October. In Keezhkazhani there are about two hundred acres of double crop lands. In this block the first crop is cultivated in July or August and is reaped in November. The second crop cultivation begins in December. In the other three blocks there are no second crop lands. In these lands and in the Kaipath lands cultivation begins in September for the only crop grown on them. It was said that in the Pangu lands of the three remaining blocks, the cultivation is a few days earlier than in the Kaipath lands. Thus we find that about February, which is generally the season when the water begins to go down in the tank, the cultivators have to depend largely upon the spring channel. At this period the second crop in Thenkazhani will be about four months old, and the single crop in the other block and in the Kaipath lands will be five months old. Therefore the necessity for a regular supply of water will be felt more in Thenkazhani and Keezhkazhani than in the Kaipath lands. The mode of cultivation being as we have above indicated, it seems to us that if there is to be a claim for preferential treatment, as there must be when the supply is insufficient, the three and four months' crops should have the preference over crops which are very nearly ready for harvesting. Looking at the question from any point of view, it seems to us that the claim of the Mirasidars to a preferential right in respect of their double crop lands is established. They are also entitled to take water to the single crop lands in the three other blocks in preference to the Kaipath lands.

The learned Government Pleader suggested that, whatever may be the right of the Mirasidars to the exclusive use of the Kasam water, the tank water should be equally distributed. His contention was that when the water falls below the fourth sluice, all the sluices in the tank should be kept open and that no attempt should be made to shut any of these sluices with a view to taking more water through the fourth sluice. If we accede to this contention, it would result in denying the preferential right which we have held that the mirasidars possess. We therefore think that the Subordinate Judge, who has written a careful judgment, has come to the right conclusion on the question. The only modification that we think necessary to make in his decree is to define more precisely the meaning of the expression "in time of scarcity." In order that there may be no future disputes, we substitute the words "when the water goes below the fourth sluice" for the words "in times of scarcity" in line 11 of p. 14 in the decree of the Subordinate Judge. In other respects we dismiss the appeal with costs. We also dismiss the memoranda of objections with costs of the Secretary of State. The order of the Subordinate Judge, directing that non-mirasidars should receive their costs from the mirasidars who are in turn directed to receive some costs from the non-mirasidars, would lead to difficulties. We think, under the circumstances, that the mirasidars and non-mirasidars should each be directed to bear their own costs in the Court below. The order as to costs in favour of the Secretary of State will stand. Subject to the above modification the appeal is dismissed with costs of the mirasidar respondents.

WALLIS, C. J. AND NAPIER, J.

Municipal Council of Cocanada—Defendant—Appellant.

v.

"Clan" Line Steamers, Ltd. — Plaintiffs—Respondents.

Original Side Appeal No. 2 of 1918, Decided on 8th November 1918, from judgment of Coutts-Trotter, J., D/- 2nd November 1917.

Madras District Municipalities Act (1884), S. 53 — Exercising trade or calling within municipality—Carriage by sea — Ship-owner unloading cargo at port — Contracts not entered into at that port — Levy of profession tax on shipping agent in that port is not legal.

A shipowner exercises his trade at all the ports at which his steamers habitually call to discharge or load cargo, which latter operation may involve entering there and then into contracts with shippers. Where therefore the freight-earning contracts with shippers which enable profits to be earned by sea carriage are not entered into at a port by the ship's master or the local agent of the shipowner, but elsewhere, the shipowner cannot be held to exercise his trade at the port merely because he employs a shipping agent there to attend to other matters, such as issuing shipping orders and signing bills of lading ursuant to contracts already made and receiving payment of advance freight. [P 211 C 2]

The test is, where, in substance, the business of making contracts is carried on and controlled. [P 211 C 1]

The Clan Line Steamers, having their registered office at Glasgow, called at Cocanada to take in cargo for Europe and also unload any cargo consigned to Cocanada. They were represented by a firm of sub-agents at Cocanada engaged by the Clan Line's Agents at Madras. The sub-agents had no authority to contract with shippers and acted only under instructions from the agents; they issued shipping orders to shippers, signed bills of lading for cargo, supplied and collected any freight that might be payable on the cargo unloaded at Cocanada. The question in this case being whether this was such an exercise of the trade of the Clan Line or carrying on business within the Municipality of Cocanada as to render them liable to the payment of profession tax under S. 53, Madras District Municipalities Act, 1884.

Held: that the Clan Line, being a shipping company which earned profits by the carriage of goods by sea, and in the course of its business traded with, but not necessarily within, port towns in various parts of the world, one of these being Cocanada, could not be said to exercise a trade at that port so as to make the company liable for the payment of profession tax. [P 211 C 1]

D. Chamier for King and Partridge—for Respondents.

Wallis, C. J.—The question in this appeal is whether the Clan Line of Steamers, who have their registered office in Glasgow, are liable under S. 53, Madras District Municipalities Act, 1884, to pay profession tax in Cocanada on the ground that they are persons exercising within that municipality one of the professions, trades or callings specified in the schedule, which includes persons "carrying on business as a company" and also "ship-owners." The Clan Line Steamers call at Cocanada to take in cargo for Europe and also unload there any cargo consigned to Cocanada, of which there is very little. They are represented in various matters by Messrs. Ripley and Co., sub agents engaged by Messrs. Gordon Woodroffe and Co., the Clan Line's Agents at Madras. Messrs. Ripley have no authority to contract with shippers for the allotment of cargo space under letters of engagement such as are now common. Shippers apply dircct to Gordon Woodroffe and Co,. if they apply to Messrs. Ripley and Co., the latter for ward the application to be dealt with by Gordon Woodroffe and Co., or take their instructions by telegraph if the time is short. They issue shipping orders to shippers who have secured space, sign the bills of lading for cargo shipped, and receive the freight where it is payable in advance, as it is in all cases where the goods are consigned to London for transhipment to America. They also settle the bills of the Dubash who is employed by Gordon Woodroffe and Co., to supply the ships with necessities, and pay the Doctor who is similarly employed. They apparently collect any freight that may be payable on the small quantity of cargo landed. Having regard to these facts, it may be said that in one sense the Clan Line carry on business at Cocanada through Messrs. Ripley, but what we have to see is whether it is such an exercise of their trade or carrying on business within the Municipality as to bring the case within the language of the statute, which is indistinguishable from that of similar taxing Acts both in England and the colonies.

Those cases have been reviewed by the learned Judge and have again been considered by us, but it is unnecessary to go behind the decision of the House of Lords in Grainger v. Gough (1) and the more recent decision of the Privy Council in Lovell & Christmas v. Commissioner of Taxes (2). In Grainger v. Gough (1) the fact that Louis Roederer, who carried on business at Rheims in France, employed an agent and a large number of sub-agents in England to canvass for orders for his champagne, which were sent to Rheims for acceptance, was held not to make him a person exercising a trade within the United Kingdom, even when coupled with the further facts that the agents in England sometimes received the price of the goods sold for transmission to their principal, and that the principal's name appeared in the London Directory as carrying on business at 21, Mincing Lane, London. Lord Herschell, L. C., pointed out that in previous cases of this nature where liability was established, the contracts of sale had been habitually made in the United Kingdom and observed that there was a broad distinction between trading with a country and carrying on a trade within the country, and that it was impossible to say that merchants and manufacturers who export their goods to all parts of the world exercise or carry on their trade in every country in which their goods find purchasers. A wine merchant, he said, exercised his trade by making or buying a wine and selling it again with a view to profit, and if all he did was to solicit orders in England he could not be said to exercise his trade there. Lord Watson reviewed the earlier decisions and observed :

"there may, in my opinion, be transactions by or on behalf of a foreign merchant in this country so intimately connected with his business abroad, that without them it could not be successfully carried on, which are nevertheless insufficient to constitute an exercise of his trade here within the meaning of Sch. D."

He referred in this connexion, as did Lord Davey, to Sully v. Attorney-General (3), where it was held that the purchase of goods in England by a branch of an American firm established there of goods which it is intended to resell at a profit in New York :

"does not, of itself, constitute an exercise of the trade in the United Kingdom, when that department of the business from which profits or gains are directly realized is carried on in another country."

These two cases were followed and applied by the Judicial Committee in Lovell & Christmas v. Commissioner of Taxes (2). In that case the question was whether any of the profits of the appellant's business, which consisted of the sale of provisions on commission in London were "derived from New Zealand" within the meaning of the New Zealand Statute because the appellants had agents in New Zealand, who contracted with shippers there that they should consign their goods to the appellants in London for sale on commission in consideration of advances made to them against the bills of lading. The New Zealand Court held the appellants liable on the ground that these contracts from which profits resulted were made in New Zealand but the Judicial Committee reversed the decision. Their Lordships, after referring to Grainger v. Gough (1) and distinguishing Erichsen v. Last (4) and citing Sully v. Attorney-General (3) with approval observed that the decisions did not furnish authority for going further back for the purpose of taxation, than the business from which profits are directly derived, and the contracts which form the essence of that business. In the case before them they were of opinion that the business which yielded profit was the business of selling goods on commission in London and that the earlier arrangements entered into in New Zealand, were merely transactions, the object and effect of which was to bring goods from New Zealand within the net of the business which was to yield a profit.

Looking at the facts of the present case in the light of these decisions, I think there is no ground for holding that the Clan Line exercise a trade at Cocanada. It is a shipping company which earns profits by the carriage of goods by sea, and in the course of its business trades. in Lord Herschell's language, with, but not necessarily within, port towns in various parts of the world. It has not been contended before us that a shipowner exercises his trade at all the ports at which his steamers habitually call to discharge or load cargo, which latter operation may involve entering there and then into contracts with shippers. In the absence of other arrangements, the shipowner is represented by the ship's master in all the business incidental to loading and unloading, and it is open to question whether the fact that this business is done by a resident agent himself carrying a business there and not by the master, makes any difference. It is unnecessary to pursue this question, because it is, I think, clear upon the authorities that where, as in the present case, the freight-earning contracts with shippers which enable profits to be earned by sea carriage are not entered into at the port in question by the shipmaster or the local agent of the shipowner, but elsewhere, the shipowner cannot be held to exercise his trade at the port merely because he employs a shipping agent there to attend to other matters, such as issuing shipping orders and signing bills of lading pursuant to contracts already, made, and receiving payment of advance freight. It was however argued that such contracts were made in Cocanada in some instance because Messrs. Ripley and Co. delivered to shippers their letters of engagement sent by Gordon Woodroffe and Co. from Madras. I agree with Coutts-Trotter, J., that this is not shown to have happened, and that even if it did happen in a few instances, what we have to see is where, in substance the business of making contracts was carried on and controlled and that this was not at Cocanada. The appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Napier, J.—I entirely agree with the judgment just delivered by the learned Chief Justice, but as the case is one of great importance I would like to add a few words with regard to the contentions of the appellant. We were asked to examine a certain number of old cases, in which the carrying on of business had been found, to ascertain what facts were there proved and if we found some of those facts to exist in this case, to hold that carrying on business is established. I agree with the learned Judge that it is not open to us to do so in a case of this class. It may be that some of the learned Judges in Tischler v. Apthorpe (5), Pommey v. Apthorpe (6), Erichsen v. Last (4) and Werle v. Colquhoun (7) have used the language indicating their application of tests other than those applied in Grainger v. Gough (1). But the House of Lords in this last case have distinctly ignored those tests and treated those cases as decisions turning on the question, where was the contract made. In two of those cases Brett, L. J., has used this as the test, and, as pointed out by the learned Chief Justice, both Lord Herschell and Lord Watson in the House of Lords case accept this test and the Privy Council in Lovell & Christmas v. Commissioner of Taxes (2) have followed this.case. Whatever therefore may have been the view of Jessel, M. R., or Fry, L. J., in two of those earlier cases we must accept this proposition as established by the House of Lords and the Privy Council that in this class of cases, if the contract out of which the profit arises is not made in the place where the tax is sought to be imposed, the liability does not arise. I do not mean that if any contract is shown to have been made in the course of a business from which profits are eventually earned, that is sufficient to impose the liability, for the decisions in Sully v. Attorney-General (3) by the Exchequer Chamber and in Lovell & Christmas v. Commissioner of Taxes (2) show that this test cannot be broadly applied. I may add that in a case of production or manufacture in the country by a person sought to be assessed the question where the contracts for sale of the proceeds are made may be immaterial. But in this class, after the above rulings I do not think it is open to us to consider any other aspect and I, therefore agree with Coutts-Trotter, J., that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount paid.

(a) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), S. 11—Decree passed in favour even in spite of decision on question being against—No res judicata.

A decision on a question in an appealable suit, when the decree is in favour of the party against whom that decision is given is not a final decision within the meaning of S. 11. [P 213 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), S 11—Finding on matter not necessary for disposal of suit and not basis of decree—Matter is not substantially in issue.

To constitute a finding on an issue res judicata in a later suit between the parties it is necessary, under S. 11 that the matter should have been directly and substantially in issue between them and should also have been heard and finally decided. Where a finding has been arrived at on a matter which is not necessary for the disposal of the suit and it is not made the basis of the decree which is given in spite of it, that matter cannot be said to have been substantially in issue between the parties, it can only be said to have been incidentally in issue. Such findings are more in the nature of obiter dicta than of res judicata. Nor can the question be said to have been finally decided by such a finding. [P 213 C 2]

(c) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), S. 11—Decree in spite of finding against party—Finding is not res judicata.

Judgment.—The question for decision in this case is one of res judicata. By the suit from which the second appeal arises plaintiff, one Kelu Nambiar, sought to recover as karnavan of one Meethala Veetil Tavazhi certain lands and arrears of rent from the tenant in possession, defendant 1. It was stated that this was a separate and distinct tavazhi under the Mani Madathil Kaitheri Tarwad, having its own properties and its own karnavan, and that the plaint lands were some of its properties. The tenant denied the existence of any such tavazhi and pleaded that the lands belonged to the main tarwad of which one Chattu Nambiar was the karnavan and not the plaintiff, and that the latter was not entitled to sue; he also pleaded payment of rent to the karnavan Chathu Nambiar. On these pleas Chathu Nambiar was added as defendant 2 and he supported defendant 1's contentions. Issue 1 in the case was:

"whether a tavazhi called Methala Veetil Tavazhi existed with separate properties and management."

As however both the plaintiff and defendant 2 claimed that this question was res judicata by reason of previous decisions between the parties, two further issues were framed, viz.:

"whether the plaintiff was estopped from setting up the Meethala Veetil Tavazhi by reason of the decrees in Original Suits Nos. 38 of 1890 and 203 of 1893 of the Courts of the District Munsifs of Nadapuram and Panur respectively and their appeals" and "whether the main tarwad of which defendant was the karnavan was estopped from denying the existence of the Meethala Veetil Tavazhi by reason of the decrees in Original Suit No. 168 of 1893 of that Court (Court of the Principal District Munsif of Tellicherry) and of Original Suit No. 3 of 1895 on the file of the Sub-Court, North Malabar."

On these issues both the lower Courts have agreed that the decree in Original Suit No. 168 of 1893 was of no value on the question of res judicata and the point has not been re-agitated before us. But they have differed in their opinions as regards the effect of the other judgments; and both the plaintiff-appellant and the defendants-respondents have contended before us that the judgments in his or their own favour constitute res judicata whereas the judgments against him or them do not. We have therefore to examine each of those judgments separately to see its effect on the question at issue. Before doing so it may be observed that the question as to res judicata has to be considered as between the tavazhi and the tarwad and not as between the plaintiff and defendant 2 personally, as they are parties to this suit in their representative capacities as karnavans. Taking the judgment in Original Suit No. 3 of 1895, Ex. L, first which is relied on by the plaintiff as settling that the Meethala Veetil Tavazhi does exist, it will be seen that the suit in which that judgment was given was one brought by one Sankaran Nambiar, a junior member of the family to remove one Ambu Nambiar from karnavanship for alleged misconduct and for recovering from the tarwad certain properties said to have been improperly alienated by him. Permission was asked for under S. 30 of the old Civil P. C., to sue on behalf of the tarwad and on the publication of the notice required by the section a large number of the members of the tarwad had joined as defendants. Plaintiff had asserted in the plaint that Ambu Nambiar was the karnavan of the Meethala Veetil Tavazhi also and had asked him to be removed from that position as well. Ambu Nambiar as well as several other defendants had, among other pleas, denied the existence of such a tavazhi and an issue was framed as to:

The finding on this issue was, no doubt in plaintiff's favour that such a tavazhi did exist. But in spite of that finding the suit, as far as it prayed for the removal of the karnavan, was dismissed and Ambu Nambiar was not removed from the karnavanship of either the tarwad or the tavazhi. Nor was the finding embodied in the decree. The finding was not necessary for the disposal of the suit, and we agree with the District Judge that it cannot be held to have the force of res judicata against the tarwad. It has been settled by the ruling of the Privy Council in Run Bahadar Singh v. Lucho Loer (1) that where a decree is given to the party in spite of a finding against him, that finding is not res judicata in subsequent litigation. This view has been consistently followed since: see Thakur Magundeo v. Thakur Mahadeo Singh (2), Parbatti Debya v. Mathura Nath Banerjee (3), Ahmedbhoy v. Sir Dinshaw (4), Venkatasuryanarayana v. Shiva Sankara Narayana (5) and Mittar Poddar v. Jadab Chandra (6). To constitute the finding on an issue res judicata in a later suit between the parties it is necessary under S. 11 of the Code that the matter should have been directly and substantially in issue between them and should also have been heard and finally decided. Where a finding has been arrived at on a matter which is not necessary for the disposal of the suit and it is not made the basis of the decree which is given in spite of it, that matter cannot be said to have been substantially in issue between the parties; it can only be said to have been incidentally in issue. Such findings are more in the nature of obiter dicta than of res judicata. Nor can the question be said to have been finally decided by such a finding. As observed by Beaman, J., in Ahmedbhoy v. Sir Dinshaw (4) above cited:

"a decision upon any question that does not open the door to the parties aggrieved to carry it to the next Court (in appeal) is not in any sense a final decision, unless the Court which has decided it is itself the Court of final jurisdiction for that suit."

Otherwise, as pointed out by the learned Judge, it would lie with his adversary to decide whether a finding against a party when the decree is in his favour should remain res judicata against him or not; for if he, the adversary appealed, as he could do, the finality would be gone. We must therefore hold that a decision on a question in an appealable suit, when the decree is in favour of the party against whom that decision is given, is not a final decision. Expl. 2 which has been newly added to S 11 of the present Code, Act 5 of 1908, does not affect this question, as it deals only with the competency of the Court and not with the finality of its decision That explanation was added to put an end to the controversy whether a finding arrived at or a decree passed by a Court in a suit is or is not res judicata in the same Court in a subsequent suit when the decree in the first suit is not appealable to the same tribunal as that in the second suit. That happens, for example, in the Subordinate Judge's Court when the first suit is below Rupees 5,000 in value and the second suit is above that value.

The learned vakil for the appellant relied on the judgment of Seshagiri Aiyar, J., in Muthaya Shetti v. Kanthoppa Shetti (7) and contended that this was a case which fell within the fourth class referred to by the learned Judge and therefore the finding was res judicata. It seems to be very doubtful if there is such a fourth class of cases at all distinct from the first class; the cases which seem to fall in that class will probably, on careful examination be found to fall in the first class. In the very case which the learned Judge had before him it would seem, with all respect to him, that on the facts stated in p. 484, of (7 M. L. W.) it was quite immaterial for the District Judge to decide if the alienation was a mortgage or a sale so long as it was valid against the plaintiff; for in the view taken by him the suit failed whether it was a mortgage or a sale. It has been pointed out to us that Bakewell, J., who sat with Seshagiri Aiyar, J., in that case did not adopt this classification, and we are not prepared to follow the learned Judge's view as to the fourth class of cases. Moreover, we think the present case falls in the first class. It is argued that it was necessary to decide in this case if a tavazhi existed at all before deciding whether its karnavan should be removed. It was not strictly necessary to do so, as in any event the suit failed as the Court found there were no grounds for his removal. In any view therefore the ruling in Muthaya Shetti v. Kanthappa Shetti (7) is no authority in the plaintiff's favour. The judgment in Original Suit No. 3 of 1895 cannot thus be held to render issue 1 in this case res judicata.

Passing on to the decree in Original Suit No. 38 of 1890 we think the District Judge is wrong in holding that it operated as res judicata in favour of the tarwad. It has not been relied on by the learned counsel for the respondents. That was a suit brought by some junior members of the tarwad for maintenance against Ambu Nambiar as the karnavan of the tarwad. The District Judge considers that Ambu Nambiar might and ought to have pleaded that some of the properties belonged to Meethala Veetil Tavazhi and their income should have been excluded from calculation in assessing the rate of maintenance and as Ambu Nambiar was the karnavan of the tavazhi according to the plaintiff's case and as he failed to set up the tavazhi's claim, the tavazhi should be taken as barred by res judicata, presumably under Expl. 4, S. 11, Civil P. C., from setting up his existence thereafter. This view cannot be supported. Ambu Nambiar was sued only as the karnavan of the tarwad and not as the karnavan of the tavazhi and as he was always strenuously denying the very existence of the tavazhi, he could not be expected to raise any pleas in its favour, and his failure to put forward any particular plea cannot be treated as concluding the tavazhi as to it. The last two judgments we have to deal with are those in Original Suit No. 203 of 1893 on the file of the Court of the District Munsif of Panoor and its appeal, Exs. 1 and 2. The suit was brought by one Chappari as the holder of a melcharth granted by the tarwad karnavan, the same Ambu Nambiar, to redeem a kanom and recover possession of a paramba from the kanomdar, defendant 2. The karanavan, defendant 1, remained ex parte, but defendant 2, though he admitted the kanom, pleaded that the property belonged to the tavazhi of which Sankaran Nambiar was the karnavan, and not to the tarwad, and the melcharth by the tarwad karnavan was therefore invalid. Sankaran Nambiar was added as defendant 3 and he supported defendant 2's case. As notice of suit was published in the District Gazette and in a local paper, 50 other members, including the present plaintiff and defendant 2, joined as defendants. 28 of them supported defendant 3, while the rest opposed the claim of the tavazhi. The issue framed in the case was:

"Has plaintiff a valid melcharth right in the plaintiff paramba? and can he maintain this ejectment suit on the strength of it?"

No separate issue was framed about the existence of the tavazhi, but as the validity of the melcharth was challenged solely on the ground that the karnavan of such a tavazhi alone could have granted a valid one, the question of the existence of the tavazhi was involved in the issue framed and was clearly a matter in issue within the meaning of S. 11, Civil P. C. For a matter to be in issue under that section it is not necessary that an express issue should be framed about it; it is enough if a decision about it is necessary for the decree. The District Munsif found that there was no such separate tavazhi as Meethala Veedu as alleged by defendant 3 and his party, and he overruled the plea of the invalidity of the melcharth and gave a decree in plaintiff's favour. Defendant 3 and his party thereupon appealed to the District Judge making the plaintiff and defendant 1 and his supporters respondents and again raised the same contentions. The District Judge however confirmed the findings in appeal. It would therefore seem that the question of the existence of the tavazhi is res judicata against the tavazhi. Both the karnavans were parties to the suit as well as a large number of members of the family. We must therefore hold that both the tarwad and the tavazhi were properly represented in that litigation. Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar however points out that defendant 1, the karnavan of the tarwad, remained ex parte, and he argues that as the question arose between the tarwad and the tavazhi as co-defendants in the suit, and as there was no active contest between defendant 1, the karnavan of the tarwad, and the members of the tavazhi, the finding should not be treated as res judicata.

He relies on Kondiyil Cheriya Chandu v. Zamorin of Calicut (8). In that case it was held that the matter was res judicata as the defendant against whom the plea was urged took an active part in the controversy as against his co-defendant. We think it must be taken as the view of our High Court that as between co-defendants there must be active controversy inter se before a finding can be treated as res judicata: See also Ramanuja Ayyangar v. Narayana Ayyangar (9). In this case however there are good reasons why the appellant's argument cannot be accepted. The tarwad was represented not merely by the karnavan but by all or nearly all the members of it, who certainly took an active part in the dispute; the res judicata pleaded is against the tavazhi, the karnavan, and members of which undoubtedly actively disputed the claim of the plaintiff and the other defendants. Furthermore, the controversy did not stop with the first Court. The karnavan and members of the tavazhi, as already stated, appealed to the District Court making the plaintiff as well as defendant 1 and the other members of the tarwad respondents. When the District Judge confirmed the finding that there was no tavazhi, he did so as between the two sets of members on opposite sides of the record. With reference to his finding, which is a final one in the case, no question of res judicata between co-respondents arises.

We must therefore hold that the District Judge was right in considering that the finding that there was no tavazhi is binding on the appellant in this suit. A question was raised that defendant, the tenant, was estopped from disputing the title of the plaintiff as his landlord. But this plea, even if valid, is of no effect in this case as defendant is also a party and against him there can be no such estoppel. The second appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 167 of 1917, Decided on 9th October 1918 against decree of Dist. Judge, Cuddapah, in Original Suit No. 13 of 1915.

(a) Grant—Inam—Enfranchisement—Inam attached to hereditary office is converted into ordinary property.

The effect of the enfranchisement of an inam attached to a hereditary office is to disannex the inam from the property and to convert it into ordinary property, with the result that the lands, after enfranchisement, are held by the family which was entitled to the office.

[P 217 C 1]

(b) Grant—Inam—Registered holders of hereditary office before enfranchisement—Suit for recovery of lands attached to office after enfranchisement is maintainable without impleading other members of family.

The registered holders of an hereditary office, whose names had been registered before enfranchisement, represent the inam for the purpose of recovering it after enfranchisement and are entitled to institute a suit for the purpose without joining the other members of the family as parties to the suit. [P 217 C 2]

Judgment.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the District Judge of Cuddapah in a suit brought by the plaintiffs, who were the registered holders of the Karnam's office in this particular Inam village, to recover from the Shrotriemdars certain lands which, they contend, were emoluments of the Karnam's office. The District Judge has found, and his finding has not been and could not be seriously disputed, that these lands were Karnam's Inam and that they were excluded from the Shrotriem lands when the Shrotriem Inam was confirmed by the Inam Commission. Prima facie, the title to these lands was undoubtedly before the enfranchisement in the holders of the Karnam's office for the time being. The Karnam's office was a hereditary office, and these lands were annexed to the office for its emoluments and the holders of the office for the time being were entitled to them. The District Judge has however found in this case that the plaintiffs' suit is barred by limitation on the ground that these lands have, for a very long time, been in possession of the Shrotriemdars. On the other side reliance is placed upon the fact that the Shrotriemdars have all along been making payments of Rs. 25 annually to the Karnam in office, and the Shrotriemdars have not proved by affirmative evidence that they were trespassers and in possession as such. Having regard to the fact that this was a Karnam's Inam and to the annual payments to the Karnam for the time being and to the fact that they might very well have got into possession by some arrangement as to management owing to the incapacity of the Karnam, we think that the District Judge has placed the onus on the wrong side, and that the onus is strongly upon the Shrotriemdars to show that their possession was not permissive but adverse and they failed to discharge that onus. It is not necessary to rely on the oral evidence on either side which, in a case like this is often exceedingly inconclusive. There is a document Ex. P-1, which throws considerable light upon this case. It is an order by the Settlement Officer for the enfranchisement of the Karnam's Inam, and it affords evidence of certain transactions of which other evidence is not forthcoming. It is found by the Settlement Officer that, for 21 years from 1877 to 1898, Narasinga Row was the Karnam, that under Regn. 6 of 1831, he sued the Shrotriemdars for possession of these very lands and that he obtained a consent judgment in a summary suit in a Revenue Court. It is said that this was never executed because all the Shrotriemdars were not parties, but the fact that many of them consented to the restoration of the lands goes far to support the case for the plaintiffs that their occupation was permissive. We have been referred to Exs. K and L, but they do not help us. Ex. K is simply a takid from the Tahsildar to the Shrotriemdars telling them to see that the Karnam, who had acted during the suspension of the holder of the office, should be paid by the principal Karnam for his work out of the Inam Taram. Similarly Ex. L is a receipt given by the acting Karnam to the Karnam for such a payment. It is said on the other side that it is unlikely, if there had really been a lease and if the possession had been permissive the Shrotriemdars would have been allowed to continue in possession for such a small payment as Rs. 25 annually. There is no doubt some force in this contention, but the facts of the case are very obscure, and as we have said, we do not think that this is sufficient to rebut the inference which arises from some of the outstanding facts that the defendants' possession was permissive.

The other question is that of misjoinder or non-joinder. It is said that this suit ought to have been brought by the mother of the plaintiffs, who was the daughter of Narasinga Row, the last Karnam. That is a complete misconception. The office under the Madras Regn. 2 of 1894 devolves upon the next male heirs. Therefore this woman, the plaintiffs' mother, never succeeded to the office. At the time of the enfranchisement, the plaintiffs were minors, but the office had been registered in their names, omitting their elder brother, who was entitled to some other Karnam's office and was held not capable of holding two Karnam's offices at the same time. The plaintiffs were minors and the effect of the registry was only to keep alive their claims to the office as soon as either of them became capable of filling it. In these circumstances the Karnam's Inam was enfranchised, but it was in their favour. As we have said, up to the time of enfranchisement, the lands were annexed to the Karnam's office and enjoyed by the holder of the office for the time being, who was the only person who had any right to them. In a Full Bench case in Pingala Lakshmipati v. Bommireddipalli Chalamayya (1) overruling several other cases, and following the judgment of Bhashyam Aiyangar, J., in Gunnaiyan v. Kamakchi Ayyar (2), it was held that

"the enfranchisement disannexes the Inam from the office, converts it into ordinary property and releases the reversionary rights of the Crown in the Inam, but does not confer on the persons named in the title deed any right in derogation of those possessed by other persons in the Inam at the time of the enfranchisement."

Applying that to this case, the result is that the land which had been an endowment of a hereditary office came to be held by the family which was entitled to the office. The registered holders of the Inam were plaintiffs and there can be no doubt that they would have been entitled to sue to recover the Inam before the enfranchisement. We do not think that they ceased by virtue of the enfranchisement to represent the Inam for the purpose of recovering it. As we hold that the possession was permissive on the date of the suit, there will be no question of limitation. As regards the question of mesne profits, Mr. Venkatarama Aiyar has pointed out that on the date of the enfranchisement, the plaintiffs' elder brother was a major and would have been entitled to sue to recover the Inam and also to recover mesne profits, and that so far as mesne profits are concerned, time should be considered to have run as against him and against the plaintiffs also and therefore their claim for mesne profits must be considered to be barred except as to three years, before the suit. We accordingly give judgment for possession with mesne profits for three years before suit and subsequent mesne profits until delivery of possession.

As there is no finding on issue 5 we have decided to call for a finding on that issue on the evidence on record, and also for a finding as to the rate of mesne profits as to which fresh evidence may be taken. Findings should be submitted in two months. Seven days are allowed for objections.

[In compliance with the above order in the judgment, the District Judge, Cuddapah submitted the following]

FINDING.—I am directed to record a finding on the evidence on record on issue 5:

"Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to the madava rights claimed in the plaint schedule for the plaint lands or any of them."

and also on the issue:

"What is the rate of mesne profits to which the plaintiffs are entitled per year."

On this issue the parties were allowed to adduce further evidence. The issue as to mesne profits can be easily disposed of. P. W. 5, the plaintiff 2's uncle, says that during the three years before suit and the three years after the institution of the suit, the net income of the lands has been Rs. 75 per annum. Defendant 1, in the witness box, says the net income has been about Rs. 70 to 75, not more than Rs. 75. There is no more evidence. I find that the rate of mesne profits to which the plaintiffs are entitled per year is Rs. 75. The other question is not so easy. The madava right is claimed only for item 8, i. e., wet Paimash number 17. The plaintiffs aver that this land is entitled to irrigation, under the Dasabandham channel. The defendants now admit this, though nothing is said about this in the written statements. But the plaintiffs in their schedule have described the channel as No. 3 channel and the defendants in their written statements deny that plaintiffs are entitled to any right in that channel, and some of the defendants specifically say that No. 3 channel is a private channel belonging to the Shrotriemdar. Defendants 6 and 7 say that there are two channels for the wet Inams namely Dasabandham channel and their own channel, and the Dasabandham channel ceased to flow and therefore the defendants alone are entitled to the private channel.

The question therefore seems to be whether the No. 3 channel is a private channel of the Shrotriemdars or whether it is the Dasabandham channel. I do not think the documentary evidence throws much light on this question. It shows that the land is double crop wet, but it does not show that the source of irrigation is No. 3 channel. Ex. 1 requires some consideration. This is a maintenance deed and it shows that Vengamagari Madi, the paimash number in question, is under No. 3 channel. But the defendants point out that the land referred to in Ex. 1 is dry land, and they say that the grant of the madava right in that case was a mere matter of grace in favour of a relation. They also point out that the source of irrigation for the wet land referred to in Ex. 1 is the river channel and they want me therefore to infer that the river channel is the Dasabandham channel as distinct from the No. 3 channel. But I do not think it is safe to draw that inference. It cannot be presumed that the river channel is the Dasabandham channel. The defendants rely upon Ex. 14, an endorsement given by the Tahsildar stating that the Dasabandham channel is in a ruined condition, but that endorsement is scarcely sufficient by itself. The facts contained therein should be properly proved. Moreover, that Dasabandham channel is one that feeds the blacksmith Inam lands and may be a different channel.

(1) [1907] 30 Mad. 434 (F.B.).
(2) [1903] 26 Mad. 339.

It is necessary therefore to examine the oral evidence to determine the question. The parties do not seem to have made a real effort to thresh out this question properly. P. W. 1 in examination-in-chief says that the Dasabandham channel irrigates the wet land. In cross-examination he says that this channel is otherwise known as No. 3 channel. He is the only witness on the side of the plaintiffs who speaks about this matter. D. W. 1 is defendant 1. He says that the channel which now runs through the Shrotriem is their own channel and not a Dasabandham channel. In November 1903 the Dasabandham channel, he says, became ruined and silted up on account of floods and is not in use now. Then he refers to Ex. 14. With regard to Ex. 1 he says that No. 77 therein is a mistake for 73. In cross-examination he says that the Shrotriemdars were given Dasabandham Inam by the Sircar and they are still enjoying that Inam which was granted for keeping the channel in good repair. He says the Sircar gave them notice to repair the channel and they spent about Rs. 2,000, but the repairs are not complete; but the Inam has not been resumed. He says the Dasabandham channel is in the river itself and the private channel starts from the bank of the river, and that is how it was not silted up at the time of the flood.

There is no other evidence on this subject. The plaintiffs claim madava right in No. 3 channel only for item No. 8. They assert that No. 3 channel is the same as Dasabandham channel. Exs. 1, 9, 10, and 11 show that in connexion with the irrigation of Vengamagari Madi, which is partly wet and partly dry cultivated wet, three channels are mentioned, i. e., No. 3 channel, river channel, and a Dasabandham channel. But considering the unsatisfactory nature of the evidence it is not possible to say if these are three separate channels or branches of the same channel or the same channel under different names. P. W. 1 swears that the Dasabandham channel is otherwise known as the "third channel." Defendant 1 tries to meet this by saying that the Dasabandham channel is out of repair, but I do not think he has proved it properly. The alleged notices issued by Government have not been produced. Under these circumstances, I find that plaintiffs are entitled to the madava right in No. 3 channel as claimed in the plaint for item No. 8 alone.

[This appeal coming on for final hearing after the return of the finding of the lower Court upon the issues referred by this Court for trial, the Court delivered the following.]

Judgment.—We accept the finding and allow mesne profits at Rs. 75 per annum, and declare that plaintiff is entitled to madava right as regards item 8 from channel 3. These provisions will be incorporated in our decree. Respondents will pay the costs through out.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 83 of 1918, decided on 6th March 1919, against order of Sub-Judge., Palghat, in Misc. Petn. No. 2107 of 1917.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 33, R. 1—Court is not to adjudicate complicated questions that must form separate issues—If evidence adduced or facts disclose in petition however show that no cause of action exists it may be dismissed.

The primary object of an inquiry under O. 33, is to determine the pauperism of the petitioner, and a Court is not justified in determining complicated question of law in the course of such inquiry. If in the course of the enquiry it appears to be clear from the facts brought out in the evidence or from the facts alleged in the petition that the petitioner has no good subsisting cause of action, the Court can dismiss the petition, but it cannot treat the petition as calling for an adjudication of various questions which ought to be subject of specific issues after all the pleadings have been filed. [P 219 C 2]

T. A. Anantha Aiyar—for Petitioners.

C. Madhavan Nair—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs, who are the petitioners, sued for a declaration that the consent decree in Original Suit No. 422 of 1910 and the Karar dated 30th April 1912 are not valid and also for a declaration that the properties specified in the plaint are Tarwad properties. They paid a Court-fee stamp of Rs. 10 treating the suit as one for a mere declaration. The Subordinate Judge directed that an ad valorem fee should be paid on Rs. 18,000, the value of the properties as set out in the plaint. The fee payable would be Rs.715 and the petitioners, alleging that they had no property sufficient to pay the ad valorem fee directed to be paid, filed a petition to sue in forma pauperis.

When the petition came on for disposal, the Subordinate Judge held that the suit was barred by limitation and dismissed it. Hence this revision petition. The Subordinate Judge was of opinion that though all the plaintiffs were minors at the date of the transaction they seek to impeach, they are barred as there were two adult members who could have sued. It is contended by the petitioners' vakil (1) that the order directing payment of ad valorem fees was wrong, (2) that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in going beyond the scope of the inquiry directed in O. 33, Civil, P. C. (3) that on the facts found the suit will not necessarily be barred.

As regards the first point, it is argued by petitioners' vakil on authority of Chingacham Vitil Sankaran Nair v. Chingacham Vitil Gopala Menon (1) that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in having required ad valorem fees to be paid as the suit was for a mere declaration. It is unnecessary to consider this question on the present petition which relates to the pauperism of the petitioners. If the order directing ad valorem fees to be paid was wrong, the petitioners ought to have taken steps to have the order set aside. The application to sue in forma pauperis proceeded on the basis that ad valorem fees had to be paid and that petitioners were unable to pay it. As regards the other points raised, I am of opinion that the Subordinate Judge acted with material irregularity in dismissing the petition on the ground that it was barred. The scope of the inquiry under O. 33, Civil, P. C. is primarily to determine the pauperism of the petitioners and in Govindaswami Pillai v. Municipal Council, Kumbakonam (2) it was held that upon an application to sue in forma pauperis the Court was not justified in determining complicated questions of law.

In the present case the question of limitation is not so clear as the Subordinate Judge imagines. If the karar and the razinamah were fraudulent and collusive as the plaintiffs allege, the question as to when the persons who could set it aside had knowledge of a collusion or fraud becomes material. It is no answer to plaintiffs to say that there were members (defendants 11 and 12) who subsequently attained majority and who were inactive. Assuming that there were members who subsequently attained majority and could have sued, it must be shown that they were aware of the fraud and kept quiet for three years afterwards. Having regards to the decisions of the Privy Council in Nobin Chandra Barua v. Chandra Madhap Barua (3) the question whether there were persons who could by their dissent or inaction bind the minor plaintiffs or give a valid discharge is one not free from doubt or difficulty. The question of limitation is not one which could be decided offhand on the scanty evidence before the Subordinate Judge. It is no doubt that R. 5, Cl. (d), true O. 33, Civil P. C. gives the Court power to reject the application to sue in forma pauperis if the allegations do not show a cause of action. It seems to me to be clear from the whole scope of O. 33, that the primary question to which the Court's attention ought to be directed is the fact of the petitioner's pauperism. If in the course of the inquiry it appears to be clear from the facts alleged in the petition or brought out in the evidence that the petitioner has no good subsisting cause of action, the Court can dismiss the petition but the Court ought not to treat the application for permission to sue as a pauper as calling for an adjudication of various questions which ought to be the subject of specific issues after all the pleadings have been filed.

In Koka Ranganayaka Ammal v. Koka Venkatachellapati Nayudu (4) it was held that the Court should not in an application to sue in forma pauperis go into the merits of the claim. In Rathnam Pillai v. Pappa Pillai (5) a Full Bench of this Court held following Koka Ranganayaka Ammal v. Koka Venkatachellapati Nayudu (4) and overruling Vijendra Tirtha Swami v. Sudhindra Tirtha Swami (6), that in an inquiry under S. 409, of the old Code, corresponding to O. 33, R. 7, the Court ought not to go into the evidence as to the merits of the case. The Chief Justice was of opinion that:

"the Munsif acted illegally in allowing evidence to be put in on behalf of the defendant with reference to the merits of the claim of the party applying for leave to sue in forma pauperis and in dismissing the application on the ground that on the evidence on record the applicant had no subsisting cause of action."

A similar view was taken in Sankararamier v. Subramania Aiyar (7). In Venkoba Row v. Thuniya Nataraja Chetty (8) it was held by Benson and Sankaran Nair, JJ , that the inquiry under S. 409, Civil P. C. should be confined to the question of pauperism and should not be extended to matters touching the merits of the case. Kamrakh Nath v. Sundar Nath (9) and Vijendra Tirtha Swami v. Sudhindra Tirtha Swami (6) were dissented from and the Full Bench ruling in Rathnam Pillai v. Pappa Pillai (5) was followed. A similar view was taken in Debo Das v. Ram Charn Dass (10), which was followed in Gopal Chandra Neogy v. Bigoo Mistry (11). My attention has been called by Mr. Madhavan Nair to Subramania Chetty v. Kulayappan (12) where it was held by Hannay, J., that it was competent to the Court in an inquiry under O. 33, to go into the question as to whether the suit is barred by limitation. No reference is made by the learned Judge to the decisions of this Court referred to by me above. All that was held in Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad v. Harish Chandra (13) was that it was competent to the Court:

"to interrogate the petitioner as regards the merits of the claim obviously with a view to determine whether or not his allegations show a cause of action."

It was held that in order to satisfy itself as to the existence of a subsisting cause of action the Court can refer not only to the petition but also to statements made by petitioner during the course of the inquiry. This decision is no authority for the proposition that the Court ought to frame an issue as to limitation, which is often a question dependent on facts and requires parties to go into the question which ought properly to be the subject-matter of an issue after the plaint is admitted. I am of opinion that the Subordinate Judge acted with material irregularity in dismissing the petition on the ground that the claim was barred by limitation, and set aside his order and direct him to dispose of the petition according to law. Costs will abide and follow the result.

A. T. S. Balasubramania Pillai — Plaintiff—Appellant.

T. A. B. Chit Company Yela Nidhi Ltd. and others — Defendants—Respondents.

Appeal No. 89 of 1918, Decided on 17th February 1919, against appellate order of Dist. Court, Tinnevelly, D/- 22nd March 1918, in Appeal Suit No. 84 of 1918.

(a) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 182 (5)—Application for execution re-presented after amendment—Time is to be counted from first presentation.

Where an application for execution of a decree or order is re-presented after required amendments have been made the amended application should, for purposes of limitation, be deemed to have been presented on the date on which it was first presented, and not on the date of re-presentation. [P 221 C 1]

(b) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 182 (5)—Execution application not in form—Application for time to amend is not step-in-aid—Nor does adjournment granted extend time.

An application for time to amend an execution application and to put it in the form prescribed is not a "step-in-aid" of execution within the meaning of Art 182 (5), nor is an adjournment granted to convert an irregular application not placed on the file into a regular one a "step-in-aid" of execution. [P 222 C 1]

(c) Limitation Act (9 of 1908), Art. 182 (5)—Act to become step-in-aid execution must be pending.

In order that a particular act may amount to a "step-in-aid" of execution, execution must be pending before the Court which it can aid: [P 222 C 1]

S. Subramanya Aiyar—for Appellant.

M. D. Devadoss—for Respondents.

Oldfield, J.—The execution application before us was so far from being in the proper form when it was presented, that after eight months the petitioner-appellant here crossed it out and amended it by re-writing it as a whole. The interval had been spent almost entirely in appellant's vakil asking for and the lower Court mechanically granting extension of time in instalments of two weeks. The case is not creditable either to the vakil or the Court. The first point taken is that for purposes of limitation the date on which the application was finally admitted, not that on which it was first presented, is the starting point, because appellant's interest is to put that starting point as late as possible. O. 21, R. 17 (2), Sch. 1, Civil P. C., however lays down that an amended application shall be deemed to have been presented on the date on which it was first presented. It is suggested that this provision does not abrogate the law, as it stood before its enactment, that the presentation should be treated as effected when the application was finally accepted, the decree-holder thus having his choice between two dates. It is sufficient that, even if the law before 1908, stood as is alleged, the wording of O. 21, R. 17, is clear and general and does not countenance this suggestion.

Next it is said that time should run from some one of the various applications for time inscribed on the application, which have been referred to above, as a step-in-aid of execution. But when the alleged step was taken there was no execution pending before the Court, which it could aid. This therefore also fails. Lastly, it is urged that the appellant should be regarded as having really presented two applications, one of which must be deemed to have been withdrawn when he made a fundamental and comprehensive amendment above mentioned. In fact he then put in the original petition with an endorsement "filed amended" and paid for no second stamp; and it is impossible to identify any withdrawal of the old petition or presentation of a new petition with what he did. The appeal against appellate order is dismissed with costs.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—I agree.

Mr. S. Subramania Ayyar for the appellant has raised some ingenious contentions. The first is that the application for execution must be taken to have been presented on the date of its re-presentation and not on the date of its original presentation. O. 21, R. 17, Cl. 2, Sch. 1, Civil P. C., is against this argument. Then it was suggested that this rule is only an enabling provision and that the legislature intended to provide alternative rights to the decree-holder and not to deprive him of the exisitng rights. This contention was based on the facts that before the Procedure Code of 1908 was passed, there was no provision corresponding to O. 21, R. 17 (2) and that it was held by some Courts that for purposes of computing the period of limitation under Art. 179, Lim. Act, it is the date of the re-presentation that should be regarded as the date of applying in accordance with law. The learned vakil from these facts advanced a bold argument that the legislature, notwithstanding O. 21, R. 17 (2), intended to perpetuate the old view of the law and provided an additional right to the decree-holder to enable him to count the original presentation date as also enuring for his benefit. I am unable to accept this contention. With knowledge of the old decisions the legislature has deliberately enacted that it is the date of the original presentation that starts limitation.

The next contention was that inasmuch as the Court granted a dozen times time to enable the applicant to comply with the requirements of the Code, each of those endorsements granting time was a step-in-aid of execution. Reliance was placed on Abdul Kadur Rowther v.

Krishna Malamal Nair (1) for this argument. In that case an execution application was on the file of the Court and the applicant was given time to furnish particulars to enable the Court to deal effectually with that application. The grant of time was held by the learned Judges as a step-in-aid of execution. Even in that view the present contention cannot be sustained. Here there was no application on the file and consequently there can be no step-in-aid of execution; what the applicant was asked to do was to make the application a valid one on which the Court's order can be passed; an adjournment granted to make an irregular application not placed on the file a regular one is not a step-in-pid of execution. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Criminal Appeal No 275 of 1919, Decided on 4th August 1919, against order of Sess. Judge, Vellore, in Case No. 12 of 1919.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 298—Omission to ask jury not to mind statement which is not evidence is not misdirection.

The mere omission to direct a jury not to be influenced by a statement which they are told is not evidence, does not amount to a misdirection of any importance. [P 222 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 300—Juror conversing with stranger during adjournment before charge is concluded is not sufficient for interference.

The fact that a juror has a conversation with a stranger during an adjournment of the Court before the Judge's charge is concluded, is not a sufficient ground for interference by the High Court. [P 222 C 2]

S. Swaminathan—for Appellant.

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Judgment.—There was no doubt some misreception of evidence when prosecution 35th witness's statement in re-examination as to what was written in a case diary kept by the Circle Inspector, who was not a witness, was allowed to go on the record. The Judge however told the jury that this was not evidence and his mere omission to direct the jury not, to be influenced by the statement does not in our opinion, amount to a misdirection of any importance. The Judge further reminded the jury on the question of identification that the identification parade had been held after accused 24 had been taken to Kaligiri in the presence of the witnesses who afterwards identified him, and he observed that it was useless for the Sub-Inspector or deny it. It was for the jury after this to put what value they thought proper on the evidence of the identifying witnesses. As regards the finding of stolen property in the possession of this accused there was no misdirection as the Judge clearly explained to the jury the nature of the possession that there was in this case.

Dr. Swaminathan has asked us to find that the verdict of the jury was vitiated by the fact, asserted in an affidavit filed in this Court and sworn to by the pleader who defended accused 24 in the Sessions Court, that during an adjournment of the Court before the Judge's charge was finished one of the jurors was seen conversing with two strangers. In Benimadhab Kundu v. Emperor (1) a fresh trial was ordered in a case where one of the jury held some communication with a stranger in the Court compound after the Judge had finished his charge but before the jury had delivered their verdict. That was a case which fell within the scope of S. 300, Criminal P. C.

The present case does not do so, as the charge was not over at the time. The proper course for the pleader to have taken was to inform the Sessions Judge what he had seen as soon as the Judge resumed his seat on the Bench, but he did not do so and nothing was in fact done in the matter till accused was convicted and the case came up to this Court in appeal. In the circumstances we do not consider we should interfere. The appeal is dismissed.

Civil Appeal No. 171 of 1918, Decided on 12th February 1919, against award of Dist. Court, Godavari at Rajahmundry in Original Petn. No. 16 of 1916.

Land Acquisition Act (1 of 1894), Ss. 23 and 24 — Valuation of occupancy rights— Land including all interest should be valued and amount should be apportioned according to interests—How tenant's interest should be valued stated.

Where occupancy or other rights are claimed in land notified to be acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, the correct rule to be observed is to value the land in the first instance, including all interests in it, and to apportion the amount so ascertained among the parties interested according to their interests.

The difference between the market-value and the value of the tenant's interest represents the landlord's interest. [P 223 C 1]

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar — for Appellant.

V. Ramesam—for Respondent.

Judgment.—We think the correct rule in cases like this has been laid down by Sir Lawrence Jenkins, in Collector of Belgaum v. Bhimarao (1), viz , the land to be acquired has to be valued in the first instance including all interests in it, and that the amount so ascertained has then to be apportioned among the parties interested according to their interests. This was followed by Batchelor, J., in Trustees for the Improvement of the City of Bombay v. Jalbhoy (2). Similarly it was held in Calcutta in Collector of Dacca v. Hari Das Bysak (3) that the proper way of dealing with lands like this is, in the first instance, to leave out of consideration the value of the occupancy rights, and to ascertain what would be the market value of the land if it were put to the most lucrative use, having regard to its condition, etc., the value of the occupancy rights of the tenants settled on the land being left to be ascertained afterwards. The fact that neither the landlord nor the tenant can utilize the land for building purposes without the concurrence of the other makes no difference. The difference between the market value and the value of the tenant's interest represents the landlord's interest. These authorities are not referred to in the judgment in Appeals Nos. 371 and 372 of 1916, to which the District Judge has referred.

We must set aside the award in so far as it relates to the appellant and remand the case for disposal according to law. Costs will abide the result.

P. Narayanamurthi—for Appellants.

K. V. L. Narasimmam—for Respondents.

Judgment. — The plaintiffs brought these suits for a declaration that the decrees in two other suits were not binding on them and for a permanent injunction restraining the decree-holders from executing those decrees. The decrees were passed by a Subordinate Judge and the present suits were filed in the District Munsif's Court. The plaintiffs valued the relief claimed by them under S. 7, sub-S. 4, Cl. (c), Court-fees Act and filed the suits, as stated, in the District Munsif's Court according to that valuation. It may be mentioned that they had originally filed the same suits in the Subordinate Judge's Court but on insufficiently stamped plaints, and afterwards withdrew the plaints. That does not however make any difference in the question we have to consider. It has been decided by a Bench of this Court, after a very elaborate discussion of the law, in Arunachellam Chetty v. Sabapathy Chetty (1) that a suit to obtain a declaration that a decree passed by a Court was obtained by fraud and was not binding on the plaintiff can be laid in a Court of inferior jurisdiction to the Court which passed the decree, provided the subject-matter is otherwise within the jurisdiction of the Court where the suit is instituted. The decision seems to be supported by authorities and nothing has been urged against the soundness of that view.

(1) [1917] 41 Mad. 213=41 I. C. 937.

The real question argued is that the valuation for purposes of jurisdiction ought to be according to the amount of the decree and not at the option of the plaintiffs. This point however is covered by a recent Full Bench ruling of this Court in Arunachalam Chetty v. Rangasamy Pillai (2), where it is held that a suit for a declaration that a decree is not binding as having been obtained by fraud comes within S. 7, sub-S. 4, Cl. (c), Court-fees Act and that the court-fee payable thereon will be on the value at which the suit is valued in the plaint. That is a decision binding on us and it cannot make any difference in this respect that other High Courts, if the contention of the respondent is correct, have taken a different view. Then, if S. 7, sub-S. 4, Cl. (c), applies, as we hold that it does, following Arunachalam Chetty v. Rangasamy Pillai (2), to a suit of this nature, another Full Bench decision of this Court in Ramiah v. Ramasawmi (3) has laid down that Courts cannot reject for purposes of jurisdiction the valuation made by a party for purposes of court-fee of the relief sought by him in a suit for partition of properties of which he claims to be in joint possession along with his co-parceners, even if such valuation is proved to be not a bona fide but an arbitrary valuation. That was in a suit for partition, but the same principle applies to a suit like this, that is to say, where a party is allowed under S. 7, sub-S. 4, to value a suit as he chooses, that valuation is also good for the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of the Court in which the suit is to be filed.

The result will be that this appeal must be allowed and the decrees of the lower Courts set aside so far as defendants other than defendant 1 are concerned and the case will have to be disposed of on the remaining issues. We may mention that defendant 1 died while the appeal was pending in the lower appellate Court and his legal representatives were not made parties to the second appeal and the time has long since passed. We do not think that this was a case in which the delay which was clearly due to the negligence of the appellants should be excused. Costs will follow the result.

Original Side Appeal No. 16 of 1918, Decided on 9th March 1919, from judgment of Bakewell, J.

Contract Act (9 of 1872), Ss. 11 and 65—Minor effecting mortgage by misrepresentation of age—He is not liable to refund consideration.

Where a mortgage turns out to be invalid because the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage was a minor, he cannot be held liable to refund the mortgage money even if he misrepresented his age. [P 225 C 2]

V. Viswanatha Sastri—for Appellant.

Mahomed Ibrahim Sahib—for Respondents.

FACTS will appear from the following judgment of:

Bakewell, J.—Defendants 3 to 8 represent purchasers at a sale under a mortgage decree obtained by the first mortgage. Plaintiff is the holder of a registered mortgage who should have been, but was not, made a party to the suit. Plaintiff now sues on his mortgage and is in the same position as if this were a suit against the prior mortgagee and the mortgagor, and defendants 3 to 8 represent both these parties.

The defendants have pleaded that the plaintiff's mortgage is invalid as having been executed by defendant 2, the mortgagor, during his minority. Defendant 2's mother Chellammal was appointed guardian of his person and property by an order, dated 20th February 1900, which also empowered her to raise a loan by a mortgage of his property. The petition Ex. 4, which is verified by defendant 2's mother, recites the members of his family and states that at the date of his father's death 16th October 1899, he was of the age of seven years or thereabouts and that he was born in or about the beginning of the year 1885. The first witness for the defendants has married a sister of defendant 2, and he states that defendant 2 is the last born child of his father and was born in Madras about 1886, and he produces a copy from the Register of Births which he says relates to defendant 2 and gives the date of birth of the child therein mentioned as 13th January 1886. Persons in the position of defendant 2's mother are generally very inaccurate as to dates and the first witness for the defendants is also somewhat inaccurate, because he says that defendant 2's father died when he was about five years old but I see no reason to doubt that that witness was a truthful witness, and having special regard to the fact that he states that defendant 2 was the last born child of his father, I accept the Birth Register as giving the date of his birth. Defendant 2 was therefore aged about 18 years and 9 months at the date of the mortgage.

The plaintiff's case has been that he was deceived by the fraudulent representation of defendant 2 into the belief that he was of full age at the time of the mortgage. It is evident from the evidence of the plaintiff and his witnesses that the plaintiff had at the date of the mortgage suspicions as to the true age of defendant 2; he asked defendant 2 to produce his horoscope and he produced a copy; one of his witnesses says that the document was pinned on to the mortgage deed; he took a letter from him referring to this horoscope and stating that it shows that he was born in 1883 and he says that he made inquiries of the neighbours. He obtained certificates of encumbrances relating to the property which disclosed a mortgage executed by defendant 2's mother. He says that he made inquiries of the mortgagee and was told that the mortgage had been executed by defendant 2 and Chellammal, his mother. According to the plaintiff he was on the verge of discovering that the mortgage had been executed by the guardian of the minor, but he never actually made the discovery. I decline to believe him. If the plaintiff took all these precautions to investigate the title of defendant 2, it is impossible to believe that he did not take the further step of either inspecting the mortgage deed which would probably have shown that it was executed under a title conferred by the Court, or of obtaining further information as to defendant 2's age. The mortgage was executed for various sums advanced in the year 1904. Defendant 2 was a dissolute young man. The plaintiff seems to have slept upon his rights professes ignorance even of the sale of the property and made no attempt to obtain any interest on his money, and I think that the circumstances in the case show that he was aware that defendant 2 was a minor and took the documents which accompanied the mortgage for the purpose of throwing a favourable colour on the transaction.

The plaintiff's mortgage will therefore be declared to be invalid and his suit must be dismissed with costs of two sets of defendants 2, 3 and 6 to 8, and of defendant 5.

Judgment — We agree with the learned Judge that defendant 2 was a minor at the date of the mortgage. It was therefore invalid and even if he misrepresented his age, he cannot be held liable on principles of equity to refund the money: R. Leslie Limited v. Sheill (1), approved in Mahomed Syedol Ariffin v. Yoh Joi Gark (2), both of which have been referred to by this Court in Raghavayya v. Subbayya (3). The appeal is dismissed with costs one set.

Civil Appeal No. 108 of 1918, Decided on 12th February 1919, from decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Vellore, in Original Suit No. 22 of 1917.

Trust—Creation—Grant of revenue to persons for their own use and also for expenses of lamps in mosque—Grantees also directed to pray for prosperity of Government—Public charitable trust held created.

A grant to certain specified persons, described as servants of a mosque, recited that the revenue of the lands granted were to be enjoyed by the grantees for their own needs and for the expenses of lamp oil in the mosque, the grantees being required also to pray for the prosperity of Government:

K. Sreeniwasa Iyengar, S. Doraswamy Aiyar and S. Aravamudu Aiyangar—for Appellants.

K. V. Krishnaswamy Aiyar—for Respondents.

Wallis, C. J.—The question in this appeal is, whether the grant, Ex. L, created a public charitable trust. The petition, of which a precis is given at the close of the document, prays that a grant by the late Nawab Sadatullah of 18 cawnies of land for expenses of lamp oil in the mosque and in aid of the maintenance of the petitioners who were servants of the mosque should be confirmed. This was preceded by another summary of of the petition which says that the grant prayed for was of 16 cawnies of land and the rent of 12 shops for the same purposes. The grant itself which comes first, recites the earlier grant for subsistence of Abdul Kadir, etc., the servants of the mosque and for the expenses of lamp oil in the mosque and makes a grant of the lands and the rents "to the aforesaid persons so that the revenues may be enjoyed by them according to their own needs and that they should engage in prayers for the prosperity and duration of the Government."

In Bibee Kuneez Fatima v. Bibi Saheba Jan (1) and Sayad Mahomed Ali v. Sayed Gobar Ali (2) grants somewhat resembling this were held not to give rise to charitable trusts and the judgments of these cases show that the Court read the grants in those cases as grants to the grantees free from any trusts at all. It was not held in Bibee Kuneez v. Bibi Saheba Jan (1) that a grant of this nature for the maintenance of a monastery would not be charitable but that no such trust was intended to be created. On the other hand, in Bishen Chand Basawat v. Nadir Hossain (3) an express trust was clearly created by the terms of the instrument, and it affords no assistance at all in the present case. Here the lands and shops are given to the grantees to be enjoyed by them for their own necessities and they are to pray for the prosperity of the State. Nothing is said in terms of this grant itself about the future maintenance of the lamps and I cannot read it as a grant in favour of the petitioners subject to the burden of maintaining the lamps There is however one fact which is peculiar to this case. The grant is made to the petitioners, who are described as the servants of the mosque. It does not appear that they were all of one family and it can scarcely have been intended as a grant to them as tenants-in common. Having regard to this fact and to the fact that in the registers maintained since the establishment of the British Government the property has been treated with the assent of the heirs of the grantees as an endowment of the mosque, I think there is sufficient evidence to show that in this case the intention was to create a trust and I would accordingly reverse the decree and remand this case for disposal according to law. Costs to abide.

Ayling, J.—I agree.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR AND PHILLIPS, JJ.

v.

T. B. Masilamani Nadar and another —Defendants—Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 2158 of 1917, Decided on 18th November 1918.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 4 (p)—"Present at, station house"—Meaning explained.

The words 'present at the station' house in S. 4 (p) do not have the effect of depriving an officer of his functions if he happens to go out of the station house. [P 227 C 2]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 4 (p) and 166—Search by person in charge of station during permanent incumbent's absence is valid.

A search by a person therefore who is appointed to do the duties of a station house officer but who happens to be out of the station at the time is not illegal. [P 227 C 2]

Under S. 4 (p) if a person is deputed to be in charge of a police station, the fact that he is doing duty elsewhere does not deprive him of his capacity of station house officer. [P 227 C 1, 2]

(c) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 166—Person assisting police officer lawfully making search is not liable.

A person assisting a police officer lawfully engaged in making a search is not liable in damages for an illegal search. [P 228 C 1]

K. R. Gurusami Aiyar and A. Subbarama Aiyar—for Appellants.

C. Narasimhachariar and S. Anantharama Aiyar—for Respondents.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—This is a suit against two policemen for damages for illegal search of the plaintiff's house. On 29th January 1915, the two defendants undoubtedly conducted the search. The District Munsif held that the search was illegal and awarded Rs. 100 as damages against each of the defendants. In appeal the District Judge exonerated defendant 2 altogether and gave a rupee damage against defendant 1. The plaintiffs have preferred this second appeal and defendant 1 has filed a memorandum of objections. On the question whether defendant 2 should be held liable I have come to the conclusion that the District Judge is right. The main argument addressed to us by the learned vakil for the appellant was that defendant 2 was not an officer in charge of a police station and that consequently he had no power to make the search. Under S. 4, Cl (p), Criminal P. C., an officer in charge of a police station includes when a permanent incumbent is absent or unable to perform his duties;

"the police officer present at the station house who is next in rank to such officer and is above the rank of a constable."

In the present case the Sub-Inspector, as he is called, who is the officer in charge of the Police Station of Valliyoor left his jurisdiction for the purpose of pursuing a gang of thieves. This was on 26th January 1915. The only evidence we have in the case as to what happened when he left the station is the deposition of defendant 2 in which he says;

"I am the general charge officer and I look after the station work during the Sub-Inspector's absence as senior officer of the station.

Relying upon this evidence the District Judge has come to the conclusion that defendant 2 was put in charge of the station when the permanent incumbent went out of the jurisdiction. I see no reason to differ from this finding of fact. It is in evidence however that defendant 2 left the headquarters of the station on the 26th to inspect some of the outlying villages within his jurisdiction. There is some doubt whether he returned back on the 29th or not. I am of opinion, having regard to what he states in the earlier portion of his deposition, that he was not in the station house on the 29th. But that does not matter. If he was deputed to be in charge of the station, the fact that he was doing duty elsewhere does not deprive him of his capacity of station house officer. If Mr. Gurusami Aiyer's contention were upheld, every moment that the officer in charge of a police station leaves the station house, a new station house officer must be installed there. Take for example a case in which the permanent incumbent who left the jurisdiction returns to the jurisdiction under his charge but not to the station house. If the contention for the appellants were upheld, until he takes charge of the station house, he cannot exercise the functions of an officer in charge of the police station. I am unable to agree with this contention.

The object of the definition is to permit of the discharge of the duties which can only be done by an officer in charge of a police station by some person who is deputed to look after that work. The aim is to bring in more men so that the duties of the office may be performed without delay, and not to exclude persons who were either permanent incumbents or who have been appointed to act for the permanent incumbent. My opinion therefore is that as defendant 2 was within the jurisdiction of the police station, and as he was appointed to act for his superior when the latter went outside the jurisdiction, he was an officer in charge of a police station. It may be that Arunachalam Pillai, the station writer as he is called, was also an officer in charge of a police station, but it is not necessary to consider that matter. I am clear that defendant 2 was an officer in charge of the Police Station of Valliyoor. I do not think that the words "present at the station house" would necessarily have the effect of depriving an officer of his functions, if he happens to go out of the station house. That clause, as I said before, is intended to empower more men to discharge these duties and not to deprive others of their functions. In this view I am of opinion that defendant 2 in conducting the search acted within his powers. There is the finding by the District Judge that in exercising those powers he did not act harshly or oppressively. I am of opinion that the exoneration of defendant 2 was right. Therefore the appeal, so far as he is concerned, must be dismissed with costs.

The question of the liability of defendant 1 is somewhat different. He is not attached to the Valliyoor station. He is the head of another station. Therefore prima facie he acted without jurisdiction in making the search. Under S. 166, Criminal P. C., if a theft is committed within the limits of a police station, and if the property is concealed within the limits of another station, the officer in charge of the station where the theft was committed can requisition the aid of the officer in charge of the station where the thief has secreted the property to cause a search to be made. That is not this case. The plaintiffs against whom the suspicion of having received stolen property was entertained had their house within the limits of Valliyoor station. Therefore defendant 1 had absolutely no right to make a search. I find no provision of law which would enable a police officer who did not belong to the constabulary of a particular police station to come within its limits and to help in the search of property. I must therefore hold defendant 1 acted without jurisdiction. It was suggested in the course of the hearing that as defendant 2 was acting within his powers in making the search, the association of defendant 1 did not matter. In Morris v. Wise (1) it was held that a person assisting a constable or that officer engaged in carrying out a lawful process of law would be justified, as it would not be unlawful to take part in a lawful act. Having regard to the rank of defendant 1, it is doubtful whether he can be said to have simply assisted defendant 2. But defendant 2 had jurisdiction to conduct the search and was doing a lawful act. Consequently, if the entry into the plaintiff's house for the purpose of a search was lawful, can it be said that the association of another in this act was an actionable wrong? After consideration I am inclined to agree with my learned brother that he too was not liable. It is unnecessary to consider the other questions argued before us. I agree therefore that the memorandum of objections should be allowed with costs.

Phillips, J.—Plaintiff's suit is for damages for wrongful trespass committed by defendants in searching their house. The District Judge has found that defendant 2 was the officer in charge of the Valliyoor Police Station within the limits of which the search was conducted. The evidence of defendants 1 and 2, supports this finding and I think it may be accepted. The contention put forward by Mr. Gurusami Aiyar that the Sub-Inspector, who had been put in charge of the station, could be the only officer in charge of the station, subject to the proviso in S. 4 (p), Criminal P. C., does not appear to be correct. The Sub-Inspector was absent from the station on special duty and during his absence it would be necessary to have some other officer in charge, and the evidence is that defendant 2 was that other officer. S. 4 (p), Criminal P. C., only provides that in the temporary absence of the officer in charge the next senior officer above the rank of constable shall also be deemed to be the officer in charge of the station. This does not take away the power of acting as such from the officer who is really in charge of the station, for it is only necessary to state the proposition to see its absurdity. It would mean that as soon as such officer left the station house, the next senior officer would be the only officer in charge and no search outside the station house could be conducted by the officer in charge. Accepting this finding the suit was rightly dismissed as against defendant 2.

The District Judge has however found that defendant 1 acted without jurisdiction in that he took part in a search which he had no jurisdiction to make. The search, being conducted by defendant 2 was made with jurisdiction and the fact that a person not authorized by the Code to conduct the search took part in it, does not invalidate the search. It is not necessary that a person who conducts a search should do all the acts connected with the search with his own hand, but it is sufficient if he is present and personally supervises the proceedings; vide Satagopala Charlu v. Satrughna Behara (2). In most searches one or more constables assist the officer conducting the search, and sometimes a cooly is employed to do manual labour, such as digging up the floor, etc., to facilitate the search. I do not for a moment think that such assistants could be held to be liable in damages for rendering such assistance. In the present case defendant 1 being defendant 2's superior officer, no doubt took a considerable part in effecting the search, but that is no reason for saying that he conducted the search, for he had been careful enough to send for defendant 2 to conduct the search, knowing that he had no jurisdiction to conduct it himself. In doing what he did he cannot be said to have exceeded his jurisdiction, and he is not liable in damages to plaintiffs. In this view the second appeal must be dismissed with costs, and in allowance of the memorandum of objections plaintiff's suit must be dismissed with costs throughout.

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Order.—The Sessions Judge of Tanjore has passed an order under S. 532, Criminal P. C., quashing the commitment of accused 3 and 4, on the ground that the committing Magistrate had no local jurisdiction to commit. This is not a ground giving a Sessions Juege jurisdiction to pass an order under S. 532, Criminal P. C. : vide Queen Empress v. Abbi Reddi (1) and Queen-Empress v. James Ingle (2). There is no question that the committing Magistrate in this case was empowered to commit under S. 206, Criminal P. We set aside the order of the Sessions Judge and direct him to accept the committal of these accused and dispose of the case according to law.

Periya Goundan — Plaintiff—Appellant.

Kuppa Goundan -- Defendant — Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 832 of 1918, Decided on 2nd April 1919, against decree of Dist. Judge, Salem, in Appeal Suit No. 3 of 1919.

Malicious Prosecution — Liability—Informant is liable for damages for prosecution though by police.

Where, upon a report to a Village Munsif, the police after investigation, launch a prosecution against certain persons, and it turns out that the communication to the Munsif was false and the persons are acquitted, the person who made the report is liable, at the instance of the persons prosecuted, in an action for damages for malicious prosecution. It is no answer to such a suit, and would make no difference to the defendant's liability for damages that the prosecution was instituted and conducted by the police, as the person primarily responsible for the prosecution is the person who furnished the false information. [P 229 C 2]

S. S. Ramchandra Aiyar—for Appellant.

C. Sreenivasa Aiyangar—for Respondent.

Judgment.—Appellant sued respondent for damages for malicious prosecution. He got a decree for Rs. 100 in the Munsif's Court. The District Judge set it aside, on the ground that respondent could not be said to have prosecuted appellant, because he only made a report to the Village Munsif as a result of which the police, after investigation, launched and conducted a prosecution for theft against appellant and his father. The authority relied on is the ruling of this Court in Narasinga Row v. Muthaya Pillai (1)

Any person desirous of setting the criminal law in motion against another in respect of an act amounting to a cognizable offence can do so in three ways:

(1) He can present a complaint to a Magistrate having jurisdiction, who will thereupon take action under Ch. 17, Criminal P. C. (2) He may give information to an officer in charge of a police station, who will take action under Ch. 14, Criminal P. C. (3) He may (in the case of all nonbailable and certain other offences) give information to the headman of his village, who is bound under S. 45, Criminal P. C., to forthwith communicate the information to the nearest Magistrate, and to the officer in charge of the nearset police station. It then becomes the duty of the Polioe Officer to investigate the case as laid down in Ch. 14.

Method (3) in fact only differs from method (2) in that the Village Headman, baing the officer presumably most accessible to the person giving information, is made the channel of communication to the Police Officer. It was the method adopted in the present case, and, as the District Judge himself recognizes, the fact that this indirect method of communication with the police was resorted to makes no difference in the defendant's liability for damages. The contention is that whenever the prosecution in Court is instituted on the police report under S. 173, Criminal P. C., the person who furnished the original information to the police, whether directly or through the village headman, is not responsible for the act of the police and cannot be sued for damages for malicious prosecution.

This certainly seems to me to be the meaning of the learned Judges in Narasinga Row v. Muthaya Pillai (1), but with all respect, I am unable to agree. If it be conceded that a person is liable for damages in respect of a prosecution on the ground that it was instituted on maliciously false information communicated by him to the Court in the shape of a complaint under S. 200, Criminal P. C., why should he not be equally liable where he induces the police by maliciously false information to send the case to the Magistrate under S. 107, Criminal P. C.? No doubt it is the duty of the police to hold an investigation, as laid down in Ch. 14, before sending the case to the Magistrate with a view to verifying as far as possible the truth of the information furnished to them. But a similar duty is cast on the Magistrate receiving a complaint he must examine the complainant on oath (S. 200)and if not satisfied of the truth of the complaint, he may hold or direct a preliminary inquiry (S. 202), and he only takes action against the accused person by the issue of process under S. 204, Criminal P. C., if he is of opinion that there is sufficient ground for proceeding. The fact that some officer, whether policeman or Magistrate, has to form an opinion on the apparent truth of the informant's information before the prosecution proceeds is no more reason in the one case than in the other for exonerating the informant from liability for what follows. It is in each case his false information, out of which the prosecution arises, and it makes no difference whether the person led astray in the first instance is the police officer or the Magistrate. The police or, as the form usually runs, the King-Emperor may be the nominal prosecutor: but the person primarily responsible for the prosecution is the person who furnished the false information on which the Police act. "Qui facit per alium facit per se." The true principles on which responsibility for the prosecution should be fixed are laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Gaya Prasad v. Bhagat Singh (2). They are at pains to make it clear that it is not enough to say as the learned District Judge has in effect said here) that the prosecution was instituted and conducted by the police. The whole circumstances of the case must be looked to. It is true that their Lordships in their judgment referred to the judgment of this Court in Narasinga Row v. Muthaya Pillai (1), and add:

"The principle here laid down is sound enough, if properly understood, and its application to the particular case was no doubt justified; but in the opinion of their Lordships it is not of universal application."

I caannot understand this as meaning that their Lordships considered the facts of that case and endorsed this Court's decision on them as correct. To do so would, as it seems to me and if I understand this Court's decision aright, run counter to all the rest of their Lordships' judgment. The language suggests to me that they deemed it unnecessary to consider the correctness of the decision in that particular case: Rather they wished to point out that, while it might be correct, it was based on a principle which was not to be universally applied. If, as I presume, they had only the report in Indian Law Reports series before them, they may well have been misled. The latter is very incomplete, and contains nothing to suggest that any of the Courts which dealt with the case found the prosecution to be, as a fact, malicious. It recites that the District Munsif found that it was not; but it fails to state (what we have ascertained from the original record) that the Sub-Judge who was the final Judge of fact, found "that the prosecution of the plaintiff by defendant 1 was malicious and without reasonable and probable cause."

With all respect I do not think their Lordships realized that the Bench of this Court had in effect held that even if the information to the police was maliciously false, the plaintiff's suit for damages could not succeed, simply because the case having been taken up on a police report S. (1) (b), Criminal P. C. the police, and not defendant, must be regarded as the prosecutor. From such a proposition which is clearly contrary to the views expressed in the rest of their Lordships' judgment, I must respectfully dissent. It is not inappropriate in this connexion to draw attention to the view taken by this Court as to the applicability of S. 211, I. P. C., to cases such as the present one. The matter is fully discussed by a Full Bench in Sessions Judge of Tinnevelly Division v. Sivan Chetty (3) and according to the opinion of the majority the action of the defendant in this case, provided the information given by him to the village headman was maliciously false, would render him liable to prosecution for an offence under S. 211, I. P. C. It would be a curious anomaly if an action for damages against him could not be sustained on the same facts. I would set aside the decree of the District Judge, and direct him to restore the appeal to file and dispose of it in the light of the above remarks. Costs in this Court to be costs in the cause.

Civil Appeal No. 409 of 1917, Decided on 27th November 1918, against decree of Sub-Judge, Madura, in Original Suit No. 11 of 1917, D/- 29th August 1917.

(a) Contract Act (1872), S. 74—Mortgage bond—Principal payable on certain date with interest at 9 per cent. per mensem and in default at 12 per cent. per mensem—Mortgage consideration applied to debts bearing higher interest—There is no penalty.

Where under the terms of a mortgage bond, the principal amount was payable on a certain day with interest at 9 per cent. per annum and in default with interest at 12 per cent. and it was found that the mortgage consideration was applied in satisfaction of debts bearing interest at 12 per cent. and more.

Held: that the provision for payment of enhanced interest was not a penalty. [P 231 C 2]

 (b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 34, Rr. 2 and 4—Mortgage decree—Interest subsequent to date fixed for redemption is payable on principal, interest and costs.

Where by the preliminary decree in a mortgage suit a date is fixed for redemption and the property is ordered to be sold on default, subsequent interest is to be calculated on the principal, interest and costs found to be due on the date fixed and not on the principal sum alone, and such further interest is ordinarily to be calculated at 6 per cent, but the Court has a discretion in the matter: 34 Cal. 159 (P. C.) and 21 Mad. 364, Foll [P 232 C 2]

K. S. Jairama Aiyar—for Appellants.

M. O. Parthasarathy Aiyangar and M. O. Thirumalachariar—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—I donot think the Subordinate Judge was right in treating the provision for payment of interest at 12 per cent. in default of payment on the date fixed in the mortgage bond as penal. The original rate fixed no doubt is 9 per cent. But it is to be borne in mind that the debts to discharge which this mortgage was executed carried interest at 12 per cent. and more. It could not therefore be said that the mortgagees were not justified in stipulating for payment of a higher rate, if the money was not paid as promised.

The second question raised by the appeal is one of some importance. It is whether in a mortgage decree for sale, interest should be computed on the aggregate amount found to be payable on the date fixed for redemption, that is, consisting of principal, interest and costs or only on the principal, if the ascertained amount is not paid and property has to be sold in consequence. The matter is now governed by O. 34, R. 4, Civil P. C., which read along with R. 2 provides that in case of default the sale proceeds of the property sold shall be applied in payment of what is declared due to the plaintiff for principal and interest on the mortgage and for costs of the suit until the date fixed for payment together with subsequent interest and subsequent costs. This prima facie suggest that the subsequent interest is payable on the aggregate amount and not on the principal alone The form appended to this rule, form No. 4 Appendix D, Sch. 1 of the Code, clearly proceeds upon this above interpretation. But in forms Nos. 7, 8, 9, which are forms of decrees for sale in cases where there are more than one mortgage on this property, provision is made for payment of such subsequent interest and costs as may be allowed by the Court. These forms certainly suggest that the rate of such subsequent interest is left to the discretion of the Court and probably also that the Court may, in a proper case, refuse to allow any further interest.

Before the present Civil Procedure Code, the subject was dealt with in the Transfer of Property Act and the question arose as to whether the Court had the power to allow interest at all for any period subsequent to the date fixed for payment and as to the proper rate. The Privy Council held in Sundar Koer v. Rai Sham Krishen (1) that the Calcutta practice of allowing such interest at the Court rate, also adopted in this Court in Subbaraya Ravathaminda Nainar v. Ponnusami Nadar (2), was right, contrary to the view of the Allahabad High Court in Amolak Ram v. Lachmi Narain (3). Their Lordships at p. 161 (of I.L.R. 34 Cal.) also observed:

"They think that the scheme and intention of the Transfer of Property Act was that a general account should be taken once for all, and an aggregate amount be stated in the decree for principal, interest and costs due on a fixed day, and that after the expiration of that day, if the property should not be redeemed, the matter should pass from the domain of contract to that of judgment, and the rights of the mortgagee should thenceforth depend, not on the contents of his bond, but on the directions in the decree. It will be observed that according to the practice explained by the Registrar, (that is of the Calcutta High Court) which has been followed in this case, the interest is allowed on the aggregate sum, and not merely on the principal money, and this is right, if the mortgagee is treated as a decree-holder or judgment-creditor, but would be wrong if the right to the interest depended on the terms of the mortgage bond."

No doubt this reasoning is intended to prove that the contract rate was not to be given, but it contains all the same a clear dictum that the practice in Calcutta of allowing interest on the aggregate sum was right.

I have tried to ascertain the practice in the Courts of this Presidency with reference to this matter. It would seem that in the Moffussil Courts the practice cannot be said to be consistent or uniform. When the High Court in its appellate jurisdiction passes a mortgage decree for sale, the practice seems to be to allow interest at the Court rate of 6 per cent. on the aggregate amount. On the original side the practice is to provide in the final order for sale, for such subsequent interest and costs as may be allowed by the Court, and I understand that an application for the determination of such interest is generally made at the time of confirmation of the sale. The conclusion that I am led to is that in default of redemption by payment on the date fixed subsequent interest is to be calculated both on the principal and interest declared or found to be payable on that date, and such further interest is ordinarily to be calculated at 6 per cent. but the Court has a discretion in the matter.

The English law was also discussed at the Bar, and so far as I can gather the practice of the English Courts in a foreclosure action is to compute subsequent interest on the aggregate amount, but in other actions such as by way of administration subsequent interest is allowed only on the principal amount, apparently out of consideration for other creditors of the mortgagor. This is what is to be deduced from Harris v. Harris (4), Whatton v. Cradock (5), Brewin v. Austin (6) and Elton v. Curties (7). But in my opinion a question like this has to be determined with reference to the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code and the practice of the Courts in this Presidency, if there is a uniform and well-established practice. There seems to be no special reasons in this case why interest should not have been allowed on the amount found to be due on the date fixed, and I think that such interest should be allowed at the rate of 6 per cent. The decree of the Subordinate Judge will therefore be modified by allowing interest from the date of default at 12 per cent. instead of 14 annas per mensem decreed by the Subordinate Judge, and also by calculating interest at the rate of 6 per cent. on the aggregate amount, that is, principal and interest calculated as indicated above and on costs, and not merely on the amount of principal as decreed by the Subordinate Judge, from the date fixed for payment, that is, 28th February 1918, until realization. Second Apeal No. 438 of 1917, Decided on 28th August 1918, against the decree of Dist. Judge., South Arcot, in Appeal Suit No. 184 of 1915.

(a) Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877), S. 42—Suit for declaration—Suit should not be dismissed unless prayer for consequential relief is necessary.

A suit for a declaratory decree ought not to be dismissed on the ground that it is barred by the proviso to S. 42, Specific Relief Act, unless it is quite clear that the plaintiff ought to seek further relief which he has failed to claim. 18 I. C. 633, Foll. [P 234 C 1]

(b) Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877), S. 42—S. 42 contemplates relief flowing directly from declaration sought for.

The further relief which the section speaks of is such relief as flows directly from the declaration sought for and such as the plaintiffs would be able to claim in an ordinary suit by virtue of the title sought to be declared. 15 Mad 15, Foll. [P 234 C 1]

(c) Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877), S. 42—Conditional suspension of temple trustee—Trustees holding properties in rotation—Suit to declare suspension invalid, for injunction and emoluments—Suspended trustee not entitled to possession at date of suit—Relief of either joint or symbolical possession held unnecessary—Suit held competent.

The plaintiff, one of twenty trustees of a temple was suspended conditionally from the trusteeship until he paid a certain fine and delivered a plot of land to the remaining trustees. Plaintiff sued for a declaration that the order of suspension was invalid, for an injunction restraining future interference with his performance of the duties of the office and for damages for loss of enoluments caused by the defendant's obstruction. According to the usage of the temple, the trustees held possession of its properties by rotation and plaintiff was not entitled to possession at the date of suit. The District Judge directed the plaint to be amended by adding a prayer for joint possession of the properties with the other trustees and ordered additional court-fees to be paid on their value. As plaintiff failed to comply with the order the suit was dismissed:

Held: (1) that the only consequential relief incidental to and flowing out of the declaration had been asked for by the plaintiff, viz., injunction and damages, and that no further relief was necessary (2) that as the plaintiff was not entitled to possession of the properties at the date of suit, and the setting aside of the suspension order would in no way affect the possession of the temple and its properties, the plaintiff was not bound to ask for either joint or symbolical possession.

Judgment.—The lower Courts have dismissed the plaintiff's suit without any trial, holding that it was not maintainable under the Specific Relief Act without a prayer for the possession of the temple and its properties jointly with the defendants. Though a preliminary issue was framed on the point, no evidence was given or taken and the question was disposed of solely on the pleadings; we have therefore to decide the question on the same materials.

In his plaint the plaintiff states that he is one of the Dikshidars, who are holders of the combined offices of Archaka and Dharmakarta in the plaint temple, and that as such he is entitled, according to the usage of the temple, to the right of performing puja for 5 days once in every 9 months and along with 19 others to the custody of the idols, jewels and other valuables of the temple for 6 months by rotation (apparently once in 6 or 7 years). He states that in 1909 on account of a dispute as to the ownership of a certain plot of land, the body of Dikshidars passed a resolution directing him to deliver it up to the temple and inflicted a fine of Rs. 300 on him and suspended him from his office till he obeyed their orders. He complains that as a result of this resolution, he has been obstructed in the exercise of the rights and duties of his office and prevented from enjoying the emoluments and privileges attached to it. He claims that the resolution is illegal and inoperative and prays for a declaration to that effect and also for an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with him in the exercise of his office. He further claims damages for the loss of emoluments caused by the wrongful obstruction of the defendants and for the loss of his reputation, in all Rs. 1,600. The only objection the defendants took to the frame of the plaint in their written statement was that plaintiff should have asked for the possession of his office as well. The plaintiff was thereupon amended to add a prayer for the joint possession of the office. The above is a brief summary of the material allegations and prayers in the plaint with reference to the point we have to consider.

On this point the lower Court have told that as plaintiff was excluded by the defendants from the office of Dharmakarta, he ought to sue not only for a declaration that the defendants' act was wrongful but also for the possession of the temple and its properties as consequential relief flowing from the declaration; and relying mainly on the observations of Subramaia Aiyar, J., in Vengan Poosari v. Patchumuthu (1) and on the ruling in Abdulkadar v. Mahomed (2) and Rathnasabapathi Pillai v. Ramasami Aiyar (3), and distinguishing the case in Rama Das v. Hanumantha Row (4), they have held the suit to be not maintainable under S. 42, Specific Relief Act without such a prayer. On the facts of this case we are unable to support that view. We agree with Mookerjee, J., in thinking that a Court should not throw out a suit on the ground that it is barred by the proviso to S. 42, unless it is quite clear that the plaintiff ought to seek further relief which he has failed to claim: see Aisa Siddika v. Bidhu Sekar (5). The further relief the section speaks of is such relief as flows directly from the declaration sought for and such as a plaintiff will be able to claim in an ordinary suit by virtue of the title sought to be declared. This is the view taken in Abdulkadar v. Mahomed (2), and we accept it. Such further relief will necessarily depend on the facts of each case.

Is it clear then that in the preseut case on the declaration asked for being granted the plaintiff will become thereby entitled to the joint possession of the temple and its properties and that he should be compelled to ask that relief and pay court fees on their value which is said to be about Rs. 35 lakhs? We do not think so. Plaintiff's right to the trusteeship is not denied and he is not seeking to establish it in the present case. He sues to declare the invalidity of a conditional order of suspension against him, under which he had been excluded from the performance of the duties of his office and from the enjoyment of its perquisites till he paid a fine of Rs. 300 and delivered over a plot of land to the temple. The direct result of the declaration will be that plaintiff will be entitled to recover the office and the emoluments that he has lost in consequence of the wrong order and to prevent interference with him in the future in the discharge of his duties. He has prayed for all these consequential reliefs. It is not at all clear that the setting aside of the order of suspension will in any way affect the possession of the temple and its properties.

There is no allegation in the plaint or in the written statement about the lands belonging to the temple; they are said to be in the possession of the .persons who look after the lighting of the temple, in turn. The temple building and the jewels and valuables were, on the date of suit, according to the usage of the temple in the custody of a body of 20 persons of whom plaintiff was not one. The declaration therefore will not give plaintiff any right to the present possession of the temple or its properties. As to plaintiffs' right to possession when his turn comes, the declaration by itself will be sufficient relief as the persons in possession must be taken to be holding the properties on behalf of all the rightful trustees.

In considering this question the District Judge says that this view ignores plaintiff's right to the subsidiary offerings when he is not doing his morali or turn of worship and does not take account of his right to vote on the question whether the bids for the leases of the offerings should be accepted or not. These are clearly irrelevant considerations on the question of possession of the temple and its properties. The injunction and damages plaintiff asks for are the proper reliefs to secure such rights. We must therefore hold that in the circumstances of this case plaintiff is not bound to ask for joint possession; indeed he is not entitled to it and the dismissal of his suit for not asking for such relief is erroneous. The case chiefly relied on by the lower Court and by the learned vakil for the respondents are all clearly distinguishable. None of them dealt with a case of suspension of a dharmakarta or with circumstances, such as we have here, of the possession of the temple and its properties being held not by all the trustees but by a few of them at a time in rotation, plaintiff not being entitled to it at the time of the suit. In the case of Vengan Poosari v. Patchamuthu (1) it appears that the plaintiff was entitled to the joint possession of the temple but the defendant prevented him from having access to it by keeping it under lock and key. In Abdulkadar v. Mohamed (2) defendant was in possession of the properties which possession, if plaintiff's case was established, would be that of a trespasser. The case most relied on by the respondents is the one in Rathnasabapathi Pillai v. Ramasami Aiyar (3), but that was a case of a trustee who had been dismissed from his office and had actually been custed from possession of the temple properties by the defendants; that ruling also is thus distinguishable from the present case.

The case which seems to us to be nearest to the present case is the one in Rama Das v. Hanumantha Row (4). The District Judge distinguished it on the ground that the tenants in possession there were willing to recognize whomsoever was holding the office of dharmakarta, whereas he says we have here the determined opposition of the whole body of dikshadars. That opposition however was only to the order of suspension being cancelled as invalid and not to the giving of the custody of the properties to the plaintiff in his proper turn if the Court set it aside as illegal or the plaintiff complied with the condition. The distinction drawn is therefore not valid, as here also the persons in actual possession were holding on behalf of all the rightful trustees. In this case as in that, a substantial value has been put on the injunction. If, as the defendants contend, the prayer for the recovery of the office has not been properly valued it will be for the trial Court to consider it but it does not affect the question before us. That case therefore supports the view that the present suit is maintainable without a prayer for possession.

The learned vakil for the respondents also cited to us the case of Appu Pillay v. Perumal Pillay (6) and contended that it was an authority for holding that the fact that the Court was not in a position to place the plaintiff in possession of the property at the date of the hearing, on account of an arrangement as to management under which the defendant was to remain in possession, was not material in considering the applicability of the proviso to S. 42. We do not think that any such general proposition has been laid down by that case. As a matter of fact the question there was whether a declaration alone could be asked for in second appeal because the right to possession had ceased by then, whereas both in the suit and in the appeal possession had been asked for. It was held that it could not be, but there is no discussion of the reasons. The prayer in second appeal must ordinarily have reference to the prayer in the suit and the circumstances that existed then. It is probably for this reason the bare declaration was disallowed in second appeal. The case certainly cannot be treated as an authority for the respondents' contention before us. If, on the declaration being given, a plaintiff is not entitled to possession he is not bound to ask for symbolical possession under S. 42.

The appellant's vakil relied on the ruling in Kunj Behari v. Keshavlal Hiralal (7), in which it was held that a person suing to get himself declared the proper trustee of a religious institution need not ask for the possession of the trust properties but it was sufficient for him to ask for an injunction against the defendant. This view has been dissented from in Rathnasabapathi Pillai v. Ramasami Aiyar (3), but we observe that the late Chief Justice has, in his judgment in Rama Das v. Hanumantha Row (4), accepted the view that the ownership of the trust property is in the idol as a juridical person and not in the trustee and it may therefore be a question whether, when the person in possession of the property holds it on behalf of the idol and the plaintiff does not dispute his right to do so a prayer for joint possession should be insisted upon. But in this case we need not express any opinion on that question. The lower Court's decree must be set aside and the suit remanded to the first Court for disposal according to law. Defendants will pay plaintiff's costs here and in the lower appellate Court; costs in the first Court to abide and follow the result.

Second Appeals Nos. 1956 to 1973 of 1916 and 1327 to 1361 of 1917, Decided on 22nd April 1919, against decrees of Dist. Judge, Ramnad, at Madura.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11—Opposite decision of similar questions in other litigation does not make decision of certain questions less res judicata

Questions that have been once settled between the parties are not the less res judicata on the ground that similar questions between the same parties have been decided otherwise in, other litigation. [P 237 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C (1908), S. 11—Competency of Court is to be seen at time when first suit was instituted — Subsequent deprivation of jurisdiction to try subsequent suit does not affect.

A Court which had jurisdiction at the time of the institution of the first suit to try the subsequent suit, but was deprived of such jurisdiction by legislative enactment before judgment was pronounced in the first suit, is a Court competent to try such subsequent suit within the meaning of S. 11, Civil P. C. [P 237 C 1, 2]

(c) Landlord and Tenant—Rent—Enhancement—Excess charge for watering dry land is not enhancement.

A charge in excess of the prior dry rent for water taken by the tenant is not an enhancement of rent. [P 237 C 2]

(d) Landlord and Tenant—Rent—Contract to pay excess will be inferred when water is taken from landlord to irrigate with his permission.

Where water is taken by the tenant with the permission of the landlord to irrigate his dry lands, it is only reasonable to infer a contract between the parties that the landlord shall be entitled to a reasonable compensation for the water. [P 238 C 1]

(e) Landlord and Tenant—Rent—Levy of saresari if recovered usually for use of water for less remunerative purpose is not illegal.

Where the tenant utilizes the water for less remunerative crops as cotton, chillies, etc., and sarasari has usually been levied in the past, the levy is not illegal. [P 238 C 1]

(f) Landlord and Tenant—Cess voluntary and illegal—Long payment will not make it binding but only raise presumption o its being legal in origin if contract to pay can be inferred from its nature.

While mere length of payment will not make a cess, which is purely voluntary or which, on its face, is illegal, acquire a binding character, payment during a long course of years will be presumptive evidence that the payment of a cess had a legal origin, if the cess is of such a nature that a contract to pay it may be reasonably inferred. [P 239 C 1]

(g) Landlord and Tenant—Cess—Landlord not entitled to levy of Easwaran koil mahamai — Meaning of varapathu and varisaipathu lands explained.

Cesses in connexion with temples are purely voluntary and the landlord is not entitled to the levy of Easwaran koil mahamai. [P 239 C 1]

Meaning of varapattu and varisaipattu lands explained. The levy of kanganam, tayermutti, pakkilai and amanji disallowed as regards varisaipattu lands. [P 239 C 2]

Judgment.—These second appeals are filed against two batches of appeals of the Ramnad District Court, which were decided by two District Judges who have not taken altogether identical views on all point. In second appeals, there are two main points for consideration: (1) whether the plaintiff is entitled to charge sarasari or average paddy varam for dry lands irrigated by plaintiff's water; (2) what cesses the plaintiff is entitled to charge.

On both these points there have in the past been a number of suits between some of the same parties, one batch of suits in the Manamadura Munsif's Court, a second batch before the Special Deputy Collector of Ramnad and the third before the Deputy Collector of Devakottah. It is contended for the appellants that the decisions in all these suits constitute res judicata so far as the parties and property concerned are the same. In the Manamadura suit, there was no appeal beyond the District Court except in two cases which came to the High Court and in those two cases, the High Court reversed the decision of the lower Courts. Mr. Moore accordingly holds that the question is not res judicata as regards the defendants in the Manamadura suits who did not appeal, because to hold otherwise would lead to certain startling results, and Mr. Venkataramayya also appears not to consider the decisions as res judicata and regards them as of small evidentiary value in view of the contrary opinion of the High Court. It is difficult to see why questions that have once been settled between the parties should not be deemed to be res judicata merely on the ground that similar questions between the same parties have been decided otherwise in other litigation, and the learned vakil for the respondent does not support the finding of the District Judges on the grounds given by them, but so far as the case decided by the Manamadura Munsif is concerned, he relies on the language of S. 11, Civil P. C., for holding that they are not res judicata. His contention is that under S. 11, the Court which decided the first suit must have become competent at the time of such decision to try the subsequent suit, and relies on a ruling in Kunji Amma v. Raman Menon (1). We do not think that this case really supports his plea. No doubt the Judges said that they were of opinion that the only reasonable construction to be put upon the words "Court of jurisdiction competent to try such subsequent suit" must be held to refer to the jurisdiction of the Court at the time when the suit was heard and determined, but that the Judges did not really mean to decide that the Court must be competent on the date of judgment and not on the date of the institution of the suits appears to be clear from the fact that they approved the view of the Calcutta High Court in Gopi Nath Chobey v. Bhugwat Pershad (2) and Raghunath Panjah v. Issur Chunder Chowdhry (3). In the former of these cases it was clearly held at p. 707 as follows:

"The reasonable construction of the words in a Court of jurisdiction competent to try such subsequent suit' seems to us to be that it must refer to the jurisdiction of the Court at the time when the first suit was brought; that is to say, if the Court which tried the first suit was competent to try the subsequent suit if then brought, the decision of such Court would be conclusive under S. 13, although on a subsequent date by a rise in the value of such property or from any other cause, the said Court ceased to be the proper Court, so far as pecuniary jurisdiction is concerned, to take cognizance of a suit relating to that property."

This view is followed in Raghunath Punjah v. Issur Chunder Chowdhry (3) and also Rai Charan Ghose v. Kumud Mohan Dutt Chowdhry (4). At the date of institution of the first suit in the Manamadura Court, that Court had jurisdiction to try the subsequent suit and the fact that that jurisdiction was taken away by the passing of the Estates Land Act shortly before the judgment was pronounced, would not make it a Court not competent to try the subsequent suit within the meaning of S. 11. We therefore think that the decision of the Manamadura Munsif which was not appealed against constituted res judicata as well as the two decisions of this Court. So far as the cases decided by the Special Deputy Collector are concerned, there was no appeal and his decision is undoubtedly res judicata. In the third class of cases before the Deputy Collector of Devakottah no appeal was preferred in some of the suit and his decision would therefore be final in those cases. So far therefore as the previous litigations related to the same land or between the some parties, we think that the questions therein raised and decided must be held to be res judicata. There are, however other cases before us to which the principle of res judicata will not apply and these will have to be decided on the merits. The contention of the respondent on the first of the two questions before us which was upheld by the District Judge is that the charge of Sarasari is illegal because it is an enhancement of rent. Rent was originally charged for dry crops on the suit dry lands, and the right to levy Sarasari now claimed is claimed on the ground that these lands have been irrigated by water taken from the landlord's tank and for this water, he is entitled to a reasonable compensation. It has been held in Thayammal v. Muttia (5), Venkata Rao v. Vaithilinga Udayan (6) and Battina Appanna v. Yarlagadda Venkataramalinganna (7) that a charge for water taken by the tenant is not enhancement of rent. No doubt, under S. 3 (11), Estates Land Act, such charge, even if not consolidated with the rent, will come within the definition of rent. But for that reason alone, it is not necessary to hold that the charge for water in excess of the prior dry rent is an enhancement of rent.

It is suggested that the landlord's remedy would be to sue for compensation for the use of water taken, but that, within the meaning of the Estates Land Act, would be in effect a suit for rent and would be governed by the provisions of that Act. Nor can he sue for damages for loss of water when, as a matter of fact, he has consented to the tenant taking that water. It is not disputed that any water taken was taken with the permission of the landlord, and we think it is only reasonable to infer from such taking by consent a contract between the parties that the landlord shall be entitled to a reasonable compensation for the water. The question, therefore would be whether the charge of Sarasari, which is the average Varam collected on paddy lands in the village, is a reasonable charge. It is very difficult to fix exactly the proper charge for the water, for the quantity of water, taken must vary according to the season of the year and also the nature of the crop raised on the land. So far as the landlord is concerned, the most profitable use of the water would be to facilitate the cultivation of a paddy crop as it would result in his obtaining his share of the produce in paddy, and the landlord might well say that all the water taken from his tank should be utilized for such purpose. If the tenant utilized it for less remunerative crops, such as chillies and cotton, as in the present case, can he be heard to say that he should pay less? It is a somewhat difficult question, but we find that Sarasari has been levied in the past. Sarasari being a curious method of levying compensation, which would hardly suggest itself to a landlord in modern days, it is evident that it must be levied according to old existing custom, and this would also appear from the technical meaning which is attached to the word itself. By its levy the landlord gets no more for his water than he would get by supplying water to wet lands, and there seems to be no ground for depriving him of what he can ordinarily expect to get for his water.

The tenant is not bound to take water to dry lands, and consequently he suffers no hardship by being asked to pay the full price for water taken by him. He has his remedy in his own hands, i. e., he can cease to take water. The landlord on the other hand has not a similar remedy, for the application of the water to paddy crops or to Vanpayier crops lies in the tenant's hands. In these circumstances it seems to us that the levy of Sarasari by the landlord is only a reasonable and equitable compensation for water supplied by him, and must be allowed. As there is no finding as to whether water was taken for the suit years, appellant's vakil says he will be satisfied with a mere declaration. The decree will therefore, be modified accordingly. As regards the cesses claimed, Mr. Moore allowed all the cesses of Varapattu and Varisaipattu lands. Mr. Venkataramiah disallowed the cesses in the case of Varisaipattu lands and as regards Varapattu lands disallowed Amanji, Pakkilai and Tayermutti. The appellant's vakil stated that he does not press Pakkilai and Tayermutti. Varapattu lands are the ordinary wet lands in respect of which the landlord and tenant divided the actual produce, while varisaipattu lands are lands paying a fixed paddy rent. The Special Deputy Collector disallowed pakkilai, tayermutti and amanji and allowed the other cesses claimed, on the ground that "these cesses have been customarily paid by the raiyats and collected by the landlords in kind as part of their rent."

There can be little doubt that the cesses have been paid for a long series of years by the tenants without objection. The karnam (P. W. 1) deposes that on varapattu lands kanganam, eswaran koil Mahamai, kulavettu, kadiraruppu (cooly karnam swatantram' kudivaram, kaipichai are deducted as common charges and the balance divided befween the landlord and tenant. Out of these common charges some go to the landlord and some to the raiyat. He states that out of the kadiraruppu 3 measures are taken out of every 14 markkals and added to the landlord's share as amanji. As regards varisaipattu lands he states that kanganam, kulavetu, tayermutti, amanji, Eswaran koil mahimai, pakkilai swatantram, vamadai, vikalkattu are the cesses levied. The plaintiff appeals against the decision of Mr. Venkataramiah disallowing the cesses claimed and the defendants have filed a memorandum of objections against the decision of Mr. Moore as regards the cesses allowed. In our judgment in Vadamali Thiruvanatha Sevuga Pandia Thevar Avergal v. Sankara Moorthi Naidu (8) we have given what in our opinion are the tests to be applied and the considerations which should weigh with the Court in allowing or disallowing cesses which have been paid for a long time without dispute and to the difference between cesses which are deducted out of the gross produce and those deducted out of the tenant's share. We observed as follows:

(8) [1919] 42 Mad. 197=49 I. C. 688.

"In considering whether any particular cess claimed and which has been paid for a series of years is enforceable or not, the first thing to be considered is whether the cess claimed has any direct or proximate bearing on the purpose for which the land is let. If the cess is payable in respect of such purpose, it will prima facie be one which is binding on the parties and the onus will be on the tenant to show that owing to some special circumstances it is not binding on him. When the cesses are in their nature unconnected with the object for which the land is let, they can only be claimed by the landlord under contract between him and the raiyat, supported by consideration or usage for which a legal origin is either proved or presumed from the nature of the cess and long course of payment."

While on the one hand mere length of payment will not, as pointed out in Sundaram Iyer v. Theetharappa (9), give to a cess, which is purely voluntary or which is on its face illegal, a binding character, payment during a 'long course of years will be presumptive evidence that the payment of a cess had a legal origin, if the cess is of such a nature that a contract to pay it may be reasonably inferred. As regards cesses deducted out of the gross produce before division of the Varam, there is nothing to prevent the parties from agreeing that certain expenses, which they consider to be beneficial to both of them, should be met by them in common and in such cases, so long as the levying of the cess is not a device by the landlord to give himself a purely personal benefit, the purpose for which the cess is levied is immaterial. It will, of course, be open to the tenant to show that the purpose for which the cess is levied has failed or that the landlord has not been appropriating the cess to the purpose for which it is claimed and levied. So far as cesses in connexion with temples are concerned, they have been held to be purely voluntary in Siriprapu Ramanna v. Mullikarjuna Prasada Nayudu (10), Ramalingam Chettiar v. Ramasami Aiyar (11) and Devanai v. Raghunatha Row (12). Eswaran koil mahamai will therefore be disallowed.

(11) [1903] 13 M. L. J. 379.

As regards varisaipattu land, there is obviously no necessity for kanganam which is a cess for superintending harvest, as the landlord gets a fixed paddy rent irrespective of the produce and no supervision is necessary. Tayermutti and pakkilai have been given up. Eswaran koil mahamai is for the reasons above given not enforceable. The Deputy Collector has disallowed amanji, and it has not been shown that the cess is one that can be enforced. We do not see sufficient grounds to disallow the other cesses. They have been paid for several years without objection and have been found by the Deputy Collector to have been paid for a long series of years as part of the rent. The decrees of the lower Courts as regards cesses will be modified accordingly.

Appellant will get costs in Second Appeals Nos. 1327—1353 and 1356--1361, will pay costs in 1956—1973, and on the memoranda of objections, each party will bear his own costs as also in Second Appeals Nos. 1354—1355.

[These second appeals and the memoranda of objections having been set down to be spoken to this day, the Court delivered the following.]

Judgment.—The statement submitted by the parties will be forwarded to the District Judge for report as to the correct amount to be awarded in each decree after hearing the parties. The report will be submitted within two months from the date of receipt of records in his Court and seven days will be allowed for filing objections.

[These Second appeals and the memoranda of objections coming on for hearing after the return of the report submitted by the District Judge, Ramnad at Madura, in compliance with the order of this Court, dated 18th December 1918, the Court delivered the following]

Judgment.—We have already held that the decision in certain previous suits constitutes res judicata between the parties, but the District Judge thinks that the question of cesses must be treated on a different footing. The right to levy cesses could and should have been raised in the prior litigation and the question must now be deemed to be res judicata. In other respects the District Judge's report is accepted, but it must be noted that vamadai vaikalkattu is not claimed for varapathu land and it is admitted that vasi was given up at the last hearing. No argument was addressed to us as regards fishing rent, and in this respect we express no opinion but confirm the findings of the District Judge. Decree will be drawn up in accordance with the above.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs Uralans, sued defendant 1 alleging that they had admitted him to the management of their Devaswom as Samudayi and given him a Samudayam deed. The prayer was for an injunction prohibiting him from interfering with the Devaswom in future, for an account, and for possession of various properties bolonging to the Devaswom and for the setting aside, meaning presumably a declaration, in respect of the Samudayam deed.

In the plaint there was no reference to any dismissal of defendant 1 except a statement that on 1st April 1916 plaintiffs required him to vacate the office of Samudayi. Defendant 1 therefore pleaded inter alia,

" the statement in the plaint that plaintiffs wanted this defendant to vacate the Samudayiship on 1st April 1916 is false. They have not so requested nor sent any registered letter. Therefore defendant is still Samudayi. "

Unfortunately the significance of this plea was not appreciated at the trial. It was not noticed that an injunction could not be asked for against a person, whose employment, whatever its exact nature, so long as it continued entitled him to the exercise of the rights proposed to be restrained. Kunchunni Nair v. Subramania Patter (1) was no doubt a suit for what was described as the removal of an agent. But the facts, as reference to the printed papers shows, were peculiar and it would have been useless for the defendant to lay stress on this aspect of them, because the plaintiff had in fact once dismissed him that dismissal having been the basis of previous proceedings. In the present case there seems to be no reason for departure from the principle recognized in Srinivasa Swami v. Ramanuja Chariar (2) and Sundaram Iyer v. Venkateswar Iyer (3) that the plaintiffs cannot throw on the Court the duty which lay upon them and ask it to grant them relief, which can only be granted after that duty has been done, on the assumption that the Court will do it. The present suit, as the cause of action was set out in the plaint, was in the circumstances incompetent, since a condition essential to the grant of relief by way of injunction was not alleged to have been fulfilled. If the proper course had been taken and an issue as to whether defendant 1 had been dismissed had been framed, a finding that he had not been, would have been fatal to plaintiffs and might have resulted in their withdrawing, with or without leave to sue again, after taking action to dismiss defendant 1. And this point is not merely formal. For if a dismissal had been alleged or proved, defendant 1 might, as he has done here, have gone on to contend that it was of no effect, because the forms of natural justice were not observed in the holding of any inquiry preceding it.

Unfortunately all this was overlooked until the hearing in this Court and even here, although the absence of any inquiry preliminary to the dismissial was alleged in a supplementry ground of appeal, nothing was said as to the absence of any dismissal until the argument. As we have said however we think the point fundamental, and we therefore do not feel at liberty even at this stage to disregard it. We therefore set aside the decisions of the lower Courts and remand the suit to that of the District Munsif for restoration to file and rehearing in the light of the foregoing, after both parties have been given reasonable opportunities to amend their pleading on the points above referred to.

In view of the course of the proceedings, defendant 1 must pay the costs incurred by plaintiff 1 to date, excluding stamp value. Stamp value of appeal to this Court will be refunded on application.

Second Appeal No. 1036 of 1918, Decided on 14th February 1919, against decree of Dist. Judge, South Malabar, in Appeal Suit No. 154 of 1917.

(a) Malabar Law—Maintenance — Member of tarwad leaving family house to live with wife is entitled to separate maintenance— (Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.) — Onus of proving good cause for leaving family house is on person leaving it.

A male member of a Malabar tarwad leaving the tarwad house solely for the purpose of living with his wife is entitled to separate maintenance and menchilavu: 36 Mad. 203; 16 I. C. 178 and 36 Mad. 593, Appl. [P 241 C 2]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—The Customary law of Malabar, as enunciated in the decisions of the High Court, is that ordinarily every member of a tarwad house should be maintained by the karnavan. C. V. Anantakrishna Aiyar—for Respondents.

Oldfield, J. — I agree unreservedly with the conclusion of my learned brother in the judgment, which he is about to deliver, that a person claiming, like the plaintiff, the appellant, separate maintenance must show some good cause for doing so and that a claim to menchilavu is on the same footing as a claim to maintenance. The more difficult question is whether the plaintiff's desire to live with his wife (for that is all the real justification which he can allege for his claim) is such good cause; and I have felt great doubt whether the reasoning by which corresponding claims by female members have been countenanced in Maravadi v. Pamakkar (1), Kunhi Amma v. Ammu Amma (2) and Muthu Amma v. Vellathumkara Gopalan (3) should be extended. For those decisions involve, with all due deference, a radical departure from the view taken by earlier authorities. They have however been acquiesced in, so far as we have been shown, for over five years; they proceeded from learned Judges, whose competence in West Coast law commands respect; and their departure from or extension of recognized principles was deliberate. In these circumstances it seems to me that the principle as regards females must be treated as established; and if it is so, there is no reason against applying it for the benefit also of male members, since it has not been shown how any special consideration such as the right of the tarwad to any services at their hands or otherwise to their presence in it, as a condition of their right to maintenance, can be sustained against them. I concur in allowing the appeal, reversing the decree of the District Judge and restoring that of the District Munsif. Each party will bear their own costs throughout.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—This is a suit by a male member of a Malabar tarwad for arrears of menchilavu from the tarwad.. The case, as it finally developed itself in the Courts below, is that the plaintiff left the tarwad house to help his wife to manage her tarwad affairs and also because he did find it inconvenient to live in the tarwad house. I do not think the fact that the plaintiff wanted to assist his wife to manage her affairs is a good ground for leaving the tarwad house; nor the allegation that the plaintiff found it more comfortable to live in his wife's house a sufficient ground for claiming separate maintenance. The cases discussed in Maravadi v. Pamakkar (1), Kunhi Amma v. Ammu Amma (2) and Muthu Amma v. Vellathumkara Gopalan (3) support the above proposition. I may say at once that I do not agree with Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Kozhipunath Kunnikrishna Menon Karnavan v. Kozhipurath Kunhikavamma (4) that the burden of proving proper cause or the want of it is on the karnavan The Customary law of Malabar, as enunciated in the decisions of this Court, is that ordinarily every member of a tarwad should live in the tarwad house and should be maintained there by the karnavan. He may go out of the house for good and proper cause. The onus of proving that his departrue is for such a cause is on the member leaving the tarwad house. This was laid down in Kunhi Amma v. Ammu Amma (2) to which Sadasiva Aiyar, J., was a party. Maravadi v. Pamakkar (1) is also to the same effect. In Muthu Amma v. Vellathumkara Gopalan (3). Sadasiva Aiyar, J., did not start his present theory of burden of proof. I am therefore unable to agree with the learned Judge that everything would be regarded as a proper cause which the karnavan cannot show to be improper.

Now comes the important question whether a male member of a tarwad leaving the tarwad house solely for the purpose of living with his wife is entitled to separate maintenance. Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar did not question the correctness of the rulings which laid down that a female member leaving the tarwad house for the purpose of living with her husband would be entitled to separate maintenance. see the three cases reported in 36 Madras Series. Nor did he take exception to the principle that maintenance is given to a member of a Malabar tarwad by reason of the proprietary interest possessed by the member in the tarwad property: see Ammini Ammal v. Padmanabha Menon (5). It is not denied that a male member of a tarwad has a proprietary interest in the tarwad property. Further in the case of a female member, the Customary law is that she should ordinarily reside in the tarwad house and that the husband should visit her there. That being the normal state of affairs in a tarwad, the permanent residence of a husband in the wife's tarwad cannot be regarded as an improper act on his part. The law as we have construed it, has made an inroad upon custom to this effect, namely, that a female member leaving the tarwad house solely for the purpose of living with her husband in his tarwad is entitled to separate maintenance. I fail to see why the same reasoning is not applicable to the converse case. I am almost inclined to regard the latter as an a fortiori case. But it is not necessary to go that length. There are expressions in the judgments of this Court which deduce the propriety of the cause from the ground that it is conducive to morality that the wife should be encouraged to live with her husband. It would serve the cause of morality no less that the husband should be encouraged to make his permanent home with his wife in her tarwad. Therefore I am of opinion that the present case is within the rule relating to the right of a female member making her home in her husband's tarwad.

Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar s complaint, that we shall be disrupting the tarwad if the plaintiff succeed, comes too late in the day. Disintegration commenced long ago. On one point I agree with him. Melchilavu is part of the maintenance. I do not think that there is any reason, as suggested by Mr. Madhavan Nair, for placing it on a higher footing. I agree with the reasoning in Valia Konikkal Edom Kelu Achen v. Lakshmi Nethyer Ammal (6) on this point. I would therefore reverse the decree of the District Judge and restore that of the District Munsif and I agree with the order as to costs made by my learned brother.

Second Appeal No. 992 of 1918, Decided on 10th April 1919, against decree of Dist. Judge, Tanjore, in Appeal Suit No 281 of 1915.

Civil P. C. (1908), S. 21—Party residing outside but raising no objection—Ex parte decree cannot be set aside on that ground if summons is served and no objection raised.

A party residing outside the territorial limits of the jurisdiction of a Court, who receives a summons fr m that Court and raises no objection to its jurisdiction, must be deemed to have submitted to jurisdiction and once a party so submits, he cannot subsequently raise the question again in another Court. An ex parte decree passed against such a person cannot be vacated on the ground of want of jurisdiction. [P 244 C 1, 2]

T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar—for Appellant.

K. S. Jayarama Aiyar—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The defendant in this case obtained a decree of the High Court, made in the exercise of its ordinary original civil jurisdiction, against the plaintiff for the return of certain jewels or payment of their value, and the present plaintiff has brought a suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tanjore for a declaration that this decree is null and void and of no effect on the grounds of fraud and want of jurisdiction. The lower appellate Court has found that there was no fraud on the part of the defendant, and the question to be decided in this appeal is whether the decree is void for want of jurisdiction.

The plaint filed in the High Court by the defendant alleged that the present plaintiff resided with his wife at No. 25, Venkataramaier Street, George town, Madras, that is within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court; that the defendant's mother entrusted some jewels to her mother, the defendant's wife, and subsequently died at Vizagapatam, where the plaintiff was then employed; and that the plaintiff and his wife had failed to return the jewels to the defendant after demand. The plaint alleged that the jewels continued in the custody of the plaintiff's wife until the death of the defendant's mother, and there was no averment of a conversion of the jewels within the jurisdiction by the plaintiff or his wife. The plaint therefore contained no averment to support the contention that the cause of action or part thereof arose within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the High Court. The High Court was competent to entertain a suit of this nature and of the value stated, and its jurisdiction depended upon the residence of the persons sued within the prescribed area.

The plaintiff and his wife did not appear in answer to the summons issued in the suit, and an ex parte decree was passed against the plaintiff upon evidence that he had been served at the house mentioned in the plaint and that this was his residence. The present plaintiff applied to the High Court to set aside the ex parte decree on the ground that he had not been served with summons. In his affidavit in support of this application he admitted that a bailiff of the Court told him that he had a summons against him, and that he wrote to the Assistant Registrar of the High Court requesting him to send the summons through his superior officer, and stated that he was permanently residing at Kumbakonam. The order dismissing the application was confirmed on appeal. Many authorities have been cited before us with reference to judgments of foreign Courts, but we are of opinion that they are not relevant to the question to be decided. The Courts of this country will not recognize the judgment of a foreign Court, unless it complies with the prescribed conditions (S 13, Civil P. C.), and one of the conditions is that the Court had jurisdiction in the particular case. In the present case the plaintiff is a subject of British India and resides within the Presidency of Madras and is therefore subject to the process of its Courts.

For the convenience of parties and for the better despatch of the business of the Courts the legislature has prescribed the subject with which the several Courts shall deal, and the areas within which they shall respectively exercise their powers, and has determined what persons shall be subject to their process; and it has provided that no objection as to the place of suing shall be allowed by any appellate or revisional Court unless such objection was taken in the Court of first instance at the earliest possible opportunity, and unless there has been a consequent failure of justice (S. 21, Civil P C.) Upon the averments contained in the plaint presented to the High Court that Court had power to inquire into their truth, and if it found that the defendant was in fact resident within the local limits of its jurisdiction, it had power to pass the decree prayed for. Such decree could not be set aside by the appellate Court, unless objection had been taken by the defendant in the prescribed manner. If its jurisdiction depends upon the existence of certain facts, the Court must decide upon the evidence whether they exist or not, and if upon the facts so found a subordinate Court has assumed jurisdiction, the superior Court will not interfere with its decision except by way of appeal: see Monisha Eradi v. Siyali Koya (1), Revell v. Blake (2) and Gomathan Almelu v. Komandur Krishnamacharlu (3):

"Where an inferior Court has no jurisdiction from the beginning, a party by taking a step in a cause before it, does not waive his right to object to the want of jurisdiction. But jurisdiction is some times contingent; in such case, if the defendant does not, by objecting at the proper time, exercise his right of destroying the jurisdiction, he cannot do so afterwards:" Jones v. James (4) per Erle, J., cited in Moore v. Gamyee (5).

The plaintiff received a summons from the High Court while he was in Madras, and at the time took no objection to the jurisdiction of this Court, but merely asked that another summons should be sent to him. This Court had therefore to determine whether it had jurisdiction. Acting on the averments in the plaint, the return of the summons, and the failure of defendants to raise any objection, if decided that it had jurisdiction and disposed of the suit. Although S. 21, Civil P. C., is not applicable to the facts of this case, there is no reason why the principle underlying it should not be applied. This principle is that no objection to the place of suing shall be entertained unless it is taken at the earliest opportunity. All Courts in this Presidency, so far as original jurisdiction is concerned, are local Courts, and there is no Court exercising original jurisdiction over the whole Presidency. If therefore a Court has jurisdiction to try a suit of a particular nature, the fact that it has no territorial jurisdiction over the suit is a matter of minor importance and will not be deemed to be a matter destroying jurisdiction, unless the objection to jurisdiction is taken at the earliest opportunity. In this case plaintiff, by receiving summons and raising no objection, must be deemed to have submitted to jurisdiction. Although such submission would not be effectual, if the Court, apart from the question of territorial jurisdiction, had otherwise no jurisdiction, it is held to be effectual on a question of territorial .jurisdiction : vide the provisions of S. 21, Civil P. C. In the present case therefore plaintiff must be deemed to have submitted to jurisdiction, and cannot subsquently raise the question again in another Court. The cases in Nusserwanjee Pestonjee v. Meer Mynoodeen Khan (6) and Alderson v. Palliser (7) are no authority to the contrary, for there the jurisdiction depended on questions other than territorial.

We are of opinion that the remedy open to the plaintiff was that provided by S. 21 of the Code and that he has no other remedy. The decrees of the lower Courts are set aside and the plaintiff's suit is dismissed with costs throughout. The memorandum of objection is also dismissed with costs.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 1102 of 1918, Decided on 14th March 1919, against order of Dist. Judge, South Canara, D/- 29th July 1918, in I. A. No. 32 of 1918.

(a) Religious Endowments Act (20 of 1863), S. 10—Order under Act cannot be reviewed either under S. 10 or Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), S. 141.

Inasmuch as there is no explicit provision in the Religious Endowments Act for a review, a District Judge has no power, under that Act, to review an order passed by him under S. 10 of the Act, nor has he any such power under S. 141, Civil P. C. [P 246 C 1, 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), Ss. 141 and 151—Power to review is not inherent but must be given by statute.

The power to review is not inherent in a Court, and can only be exercised if it is permitted by Statute. [P 246 C 1]

A. Narayanaswami Aiyar for K. N. Aiya Aiyar—for Petitioner.

B. Sitaram Row—for Opposite Party.

Oldfield, J.—The only question we have to decide is whether a District Judge can, at the instance of a party, review an order passed by him under S. 10, Act 20 of 1863. The Act contains no explicit provision for a review and petitioner has accordingly supported his claim to one with reference to (1) the Code of Civil Procedure, (2) the inherent power of the Court. As regards the Code there is nothing in the Act to apply its provisions and they can be applicable, if at all, only with reference to S 141 of the Code itself. That section however does no more than provide for the procedure to be adopted by Courts of civil jurisdiction in dealing with matters before them. It does not authorize an appeal, since that would not be a mere matter of procedure but the recognition of a substantive right, which must be conferred in explicit terms. Damodara Menon v. Kittappa Menon (1). And similarly it confers no right to a review. For we have not been shown how the one right stands on a different footing from the other.

To turn to the alternative ground for petitioner's claim, that the power or duty to review an erroneous decision is inherent in the Court, he has supported it mainly with reference to Syud Tuffuzzool Hossein Khan v. Rughoonath Pershad (2). I referred to the material dicta in that case in my judgment in Muthiah Chettiar v. Bawa Sahib (3) and I am still of opinion that the Court's action, which the Judicial Committee then approved, consisted merely in the recognition that previous proceedings authorized by it were void. I may now add that the case can be regarded on the widest construction only as authorizing the Court to repudiate its previous proceedings on the ground that they were without jurisdiction, Debi Bakhsh Singh v. Habib Shah (4) being similarly decided in very similar circumstances, or alternatively on the ground referred to in the judgment that a mistake had been made through inadvertence. Again in Mahomad Kala Mea v. Harperink (5) the right to review was recognised, because the proceedings were vitiated by the fraud or misrepresentation of an officer of the Court.

These cases however merely constitute exceptions to a rule which is otherwise well established, and the facts in none of them in any degree resemble those alleged before us. For the rule that a Court cannot review its own decision except so far as it is permitted to do so by statute, is of general authority, since it is recognized alike in England, for instance in Drew v. Willis (6) and in India in Damodara Nadar v. Manicka Vachaka Dasika Pandara Sannadhi (7), Lala Pryag Lal v. Jai Narayan Singh (8) and Baij Nath Ram Goenka v. Nand Kumar Singh (9). And here the petitioner has alleged only that, if he had had a better opportunity of laying his case before the lower Court, he would have been able to adduce evidence, which would have resulted in a different decision. In these circumstances there was no ground on which the lower Court could be asked to review its order. The civil revision petition must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question raised in the order of the learned District Judge is a very important one and I shall therefore say a few words. The ground has been cleared considerably after hearing the very able arguments of Mr. Sitaram Rao who appeared for the counter-petitioner. It was argued by the learned vakil for the petitioner that, as under the ruling of the Judicial Committee in Balakrishna Udayar v. Vasudeva Aiyar (10) the District Judge in filling up a vacancy under S. 10, Act 10 of 1863 is acting judicially, his orders are clothed with all the rights and are subject to all the disabilities which attach to his judgments in an ordinary civil action. I do not think this result follows from the judgment of the Privy Council. District Judges in this Presidency have jurisdiction to hear and determine cases under special Acts. In some of them, the procedure to be followed is prescribed. In others the Civil Procedure Code is referred to as regulating procedure. Where neither of these provisions exist, the District Judge if he is asked to deal with the subject judicially, should act on the principles of audi alteram partem, take such evidence as may be tendered and decide the matter according to well-recognized principles of jurisprudence. Such a disposal does not necessitate the application of all the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure to his procedure and conclusions.

It was next argued that S. 141, Civil P. C. ,is indicative of a general enunciation of principle by the legislature that to all the judicial proceedings, the Civil Procedure Code is applicable. The section only empowers the Judge to regulate judicial trials by rules as to summoning of witnesses, etc., which are to be found in the Code, and not that the Code is to be applied in its entirety to such proceedings, including power of appeal and of review. The last argument related to the inherent power of a judicial officer to review his own judgment. It is settled law that a case is not open to appeal unless the statute gives such a right. The power to review must also be given by the statute. Prima facie a party who has obtained a decision is entitled to keep it unassailed, unless the legislature has indicated the mode by which it can be set aside. A review is practically the hearing of an appeal by the same officer who decided the case. There is at least as good reason for saying that such power should not be exercised unless the statute gives it, as for saying that another tribunal should not hear an appeal from the trial Court unless such a power is given to it by statute. This was the view taken by Lord Esher in Drew v. Willis (6). In Charles Bright & Co. Ltd. v. Sellar (11) and in Hession v. Jones (12) the same principle was enunciated. The decision in The Bolivar (13), as pointed out by Mr. B. Sitaram Rao, proceeds on the ground that no party should be condemned unheard and when such a procedure has been adopted, the Court has inherent power to reconsider its decision.

The course of decisions in this country has followed the same line. In Damodara Nadar v. Manicka Vachaka Desika Pandara Sannadhi (7), in which the question was whether a Collector can review his order under the Revenue Recovery Act, this Court following Drew v. Willis (6) held that the right to review is not an inherent power. Lala Priyag Lal v. Jai Narayan Singh (8) is to the same effect. In Baij Nath Ram Goenka v. Nand Kumar Singh (14) a similar view was taken. When that case was taken before the Privy Council, Lord Atkinson, in the course of the argument and in the short judgment that he delivered on behalf of the Board, declared in explicit terms that the power to review is not inherent in a Court. Mr. Sitaram Rao with characteristic frankness drew our attention to Syud Tuffuzzool Hossein Khan v. Rughoonath Pershad (2) as sounding the other way. After reading that judgment I am convinced the Judicial Committee did not intend to lay down that a Court has power to review its own judgment even though there is no law empowering it to do so. It was pointed out in that case that the order was an invalid one; that is to say, it was an order which the Court had no jurisdiction to pass. That decision is of the same class to which The Bolivar (13) belongs. Another Privy Council case in Debi Bakhsh Singh v. Habib Shah (4) proceeds on the ground that a Court has power to correct mistakes into which it has been led by inadvertence. In Mahomed Kala Mea v. Harperink (5) the auction-purchaser was misled by the misrepresentation of the Court officers. The Judicial Committee held that a Court should be careful to see that it does not contribute to the inflicting of injuries on persons who come before it, believing that the Court and its officers would act honestly. These cases do not affect the present question.

In a review, in short, a party generally claims a reconsideration of the decision on the ground either there is some fresh evidence or a new pronouncement of law or some new matter which, if taken into account, would have affected the attitude of the Court regarding the matter in dispute. Such a consideration is analogous to what happens on the hearing of an appeal and is not analogous to proceedings in which for fraud or inadvertence the Court is permitted to set aside its order. I am therefore of opinion that a District Judge has no power to review his own decision passed under S. 10, Religious

Second Appeal No. 1287 of 1918, Decided on 4th April 1919, against decree of District Judge, South Malabar, in A. S. No. 501 of 1917.

(a) Malabar Law—Maintenance—Wife not belonging to husband's tarwad is not entitled to maintenance or menchilavu.

According to Malabar law a wife who belongs to a tarwad different from that of her husband is not entitled to maintenance from her husband's tarwad, and, having no legal right to maintenance, she is not entitled to menchilavu, i. e., a luxurious form of maintenance

[P 247 C 1,2]

(b) Malabar Law—Maintenance—Claim for menchilavu is similar to arrears of maintenance and can be decreed.

A claim for compensation for menchilavu is on the same footing as a claim for past maintenance for which the Courts may give a decree.

[P 247 C 2]

C. Madhavan Nair—for Appellant.

C. V. Ananthakrishnan Aiyar—for Respondents.

Judgment.—Appellant's counsel contends, that an anandravan of a Malabar tarwad is entitled to menchilavu not only for himself, but also for his wife, who belongs to another tarwad. Prima facie, a junior member of a Malabar tarwad, whether male or female, must look to the karnavan of his or her own tarwad for maintenance. If therefore a woman who can claim maintenance from her own karnavan, is entitled also to claim maintenance from her husband's tarwad, it gives her a right apparently opposed to the principles of Marumakathayam law and we have not been referred to any authority which recognizes such a right except Parvathi v. Kamaran (1). That case is however no authority for any such proposition of law. This Court merely accepted a finding that such a custom existed in North Malabar, and this finding, based on the evidence of two witnesses, was not objected to. We are not therefore prepared to accept without authority this new proposition of law that a wife is entitled to maintenance from her husband's tarwad, a proposition which even in Parvathi v. Kamaran (1) was described as inconsistent with the principles of Marumakathayam law. If the wife has not a legal right to bare maintenance a fortiori her claim to menchilavu, which may be termed a luxurious form of maintenance, must be negatived.

A memorandum of objections is filed for respondent, and it is contended that plaintiff is not entitled to any money allowance from the karnavan, and reliance is placed on Kunhammatha v. Kunhi Kutti (2). In this case however no money allowance is decreed, but only compensation for menchilavu not received in the past, to which plaintiff has been held to be entitled. This claim to menchilavu must be treated as on the same footing as a claim to past maintenance for which undoubtedly a decree could be given: Vide Kelu Achen v. Lakshmi Nethyar Ammal (3) and Kalavoor Chembazhi Govindan Nair v. Kunja Nayar (4).

The second appeal and memorandum of objections are both dismissed with costs.

Second Appeals Nos. 345 and 401 of 1918, Decided on 23rd April 1919, against decree of Sub-Judge, Coimbatore, in Appeal Suit No 86 of 1917.

(a) Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877), S. 31—Property transferred wrongly described—Both rectification or mere declaration of title can be claimed—In suit for recovery purchaser can prove real intention under Evidence Act (1 of 1872), Ss. 95 to 97.

Section 31 Specific Relief Act is only an enabling section. It is open to a transferee to seek relief by rectification under this section, but that is not his only remedy. He can protect his title as defendant without rectification. He can sue for a declaration that the property belongs to him without seeking rectification, in which case he can avail himself of the provisions of Ss. 95 to 97, Evidence Act.

Where property is transferred to a person and the deed of transfer gives a wrong number or description of the property conveyed which does not belong to the transferor, the transferee is entitled to treat his title to the property that was really intended to be conveyed as complete at the time of the execution and registration of the document, and to plead misdescription as a defence in an action against him for the recovery of the property, invoking in aid the provisions of Ss. 95 to 97, Evidence Act. [P 248 C 2]

(b) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 41—Property wrongly described—Purchaser allowing vendor to deal with property—Bonafide purchaser for value of same property will get preference.

A subsequent bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the property that was intended to be conveyed by the prior deed of transfer, will have preference as against the first transferee if the latter, by his act or omission, made it possible for the transferor to deal with the property, the principle being that of two innocent transferees the one who has rendered it possible for the owner to deal with the property a second time must suffer for his negligence. A. Viswanatha Aiyar—for Respondent.

Judgment.—As the lower appellate Court has not properly understood the pleadings and has not applied the law correctly, it is necessary to state the facts. One Kuttianna Goundan was the absolute owner of the properties in suit. By two contemporaneous deeds, Ex. B and C, he disposed of the whole of his property in April 1906. By Ex. B, he gave some property to his concubine with remainder over after her death to the plaintiff. By Ex. C he gave all the remaining properties to the plaintiff, who was his nephew. The uncle and nephew subsequently fell out and there was another document in 1908. This is Exhibit D. By it, the plaintiff gave back a portion of the properties covered by Ex. C to Kuttianna. By Exs. B and C the donor purports to the donees Survey No. 553 consisting of 6 acres 52 cents. It is the common case of all the parties that Kuttianna was not possessed of Survey No. 553. Further the extent of Survey No. 553 which belongs to a third party is not acres 6·52 in extent. The donor was the owner of Survey No. 560, which is 6 acres and 52 cents in extent. There can be no doubt that it was this property that was referred to as Survey No. 553, and this is found by both the lower Courts.

After these transactions Kuttianna sold to the defendant Survey No. 560 in 1911. The concubine died a month before the suit. The case for the plaintiff is that he became the owner of Survey No. 560 under Ex. C and that there was no title left in Kuttianna to sell that property to the defendant. The District Munsif gave a decree to the plaintiff as prayed for. In appeal, the Subordinate Judge has taken the view that Ex. D was the only basis of the plaintiff's title. There is no warrant for this conclusion. It is not pleaded that Ex. D superseded Ex. C. There is no issue about it, and even in the grounds of appeal to the lower appellate Court, there is no complaint that Ex. D should be regarded as the only title under which plaintiff should claim.

Both the Courts below have dealt with the case as if plaintiff's case was one for rectification of Ex. C. In this Court also, the authorities quoted by the learned vakil for the defendant referred to this aspect of the case. In our opinion the Courts below were wrong. S. 31, Specific Relief Act, is only an enabling section. It is open to the transferee to seek relief by rectification under it. If he gets a decree for rectification, the plea of a possible innocent purchaser that he got it bona fide for value without notice might be avoided. But the transferee is not bound to seek this remedy. He can protect his title as defendant without rectification : see Rangasawmi Aiyangar v. Sowri Aiyangar (1). He can have a declaration as plaintiff that the property belongs to him without seeking rectification. In such cases the provisions of Ss. 95 to 97, Evidence Act, can be availed of by him. This was the course pointed out in Karuppa Goundan v. Periathambi Goundan (2). The learned vakil for the defendant suggested that even in such cases there must be a prayer for rectification. We do not think that it was held in Karuppa Goundan v. Periathambi Goundan (2), that without rectification, the title would not be complete. What was said was that if the plaintiff asked for this relief, it may be granted by amending the plaint. As was pointed out in White v. White (3), the decree declaring that Survey No. 560 was covered by Ex. C would give to the plaintiff all that he wants. We are therefore, of opinion that the plaintiff's claim to the property was complete by the execution and registration of Ex. C.

(1) [1916] 39 Mad. 792=29 I. C. 538.
(2) [1907] 30 Mad. 397=2 M. L. T. 336.

There is the further question whether this title can prevail against that of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. If the plaintiff by his act or omission made it possible to the grantor to deal with the property and if the purchaser, without knowledge that Survey No. 560 was really conveyed by Ex. C, bona fide paid consideration, it may be that he would be entitled to the property in preference to the plaintiff. The principle is well setted that of two innocent transferees, the one who has rendered it possible to the owner to deal with the property a second time must suffer for his negligence. It is not necessary to cite authorities for this proposition. Before finally disposing of this case, we must ask the Subordinate Judge to return a finding on the question, in the light of the above observations, "Whether the defendant is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice." No fresh evidence should be adduced. The finding should be submitted within six weeks and seven days will be allowed for filing objections.

[In compliance with the order contained in the above judgment, the Subordinate Judge of Coimbatore submitted the following.]

Finding—A finding has been called for by the High Court on the following issue: Whether the defendant is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice?"

It is urged by the appellant that as Kuttianna, the vendor of the land under Ex. 2, put the defendant in possession of the sale deed Ex. I under which Kuttianna's father acquired the land and as Ex. 2, made no mention of a partition deed, it was unnecessary for the defendant to have ascertained anything more about the title of Kuttianna to the land.

No doubt the partition deed Ex. E under which the land fell to the share of Kuttianna at a division between himself and his brothers, the deed of gift Ex. C under which the land was given to plaintiff along with some other lands by Kuttianna, Ex K which is a mortgage bond executed by plaintiff in respect of the suit land among others and attested by defendant, and Ex. D which is a settlement deed executed between plaintiff and Kuttianna and attested by defendant, refer to the suit land by a wrong Survey No. 553 while it is really 560. Ex. D does not mention the suit land as having been allotted to plaintiff, but only refers to the northern moiety of it as having been given to one Ammani Ammal for life for her maintenance. The title of plaintiff under Ex. C in respect of the suit land remains unaffected as observed by their Lordships in appeal.

Defendant is a merchant of Erode living at Selambagoundenpalayam, which is two or three miles from the village at which the plaintiff is living and the suit land is situate. He was aware of the disputes between the uncle and the nephew and of the arrangement come to as regards the enjoyment of lands. He also knew that a moiety of a land was given to Kuttianna's concubine for maintenance. If defendant knew that only one nanja land was reserved for Kuttianna's enjoyment, it was but reasonable defendant should have ascertained how Kuttianna Gounden got the suit land. Kuttianna Gounden had brothers. If there was partition, defendant was bound to ascertain whether Kuttianna Gounden got it under the partition deed. If this had been done it would have revealed the fact that the land was referred to by a wrong number. Then it would have also brought to light the fact that subject to one moiety of it being enjoyed for life by Ammani Ammal, the whole of it was given to the plaintiff under the deed of gift.

There seems to be no doubt whatever that Ammani Ammal was in possession and enjoyment of the northern moiety until her death a few months before the institution of the suit, and the cist of the land has been paid by plaintiff from 1907. It is more likely that, as stated by P. Ws. 1 to 8, the land was in the possession of plaintiff than it was in the possession of Kuttianna Gounden as stated by P. W. 9. Defendant exercised no reasonable diligence to ascertain and find out how Kuttianna was entitled to the property, whether Kuttianna was in possession and enjoyment of theland and who paid the assessment of the land.

The mere payment of the consideration spoken to by defendant and borne out by an entry in his account book and the inferential evidence given by D. W. 1 that as there is a recital in Ex. 2 as to payment, the conside ration would have been paid, do not impress me as sufficient in this case to find that there was actual payment of consideration in spite of defendant's position as a man paying a large kandayam and income-tax as a trader.

I find that defendant is not a purchaser for value without notice.

[These second appeals coming on for final hearing after the return of the finding of the lower appellate Court upon the issue referred by the Court for trial, the Court delivered the following]

Judgment.—We accept the finding and dismiss Second Appeal No. 345 of 1918 with costs. As a result of this conclusion, the decree in Seocnd Appeal No. 401 of 1918 will be reversed and the decree of the District Munsif will be restored. As was held by the Subordinate Judge in the appeal we have confirmed, there must be an inquiry as to mesne profits in respect of the property covered by Second Appeal No. 401 of 1918 as well and a final decree embodying the result must be passed. There will be no costs in this Court in Second Appeal No. 401 of 1918. Plaintiff will have his costs in the lower appellate Court.

Civil Appeal No. 239 of 1917, Decided on 8th April 1918, from decree of Sub-Judge, South Malabar, D/- 26th March 1917, in Original Suit No. 33 of 1915.

(a) Malabar Law—Kanom—Grant of melcharth is not valid unless for necessity or benefit to tarwad.

The granting of a melcharth before the expiry of the term of the kanom is invalid, save where the melcharth-holder proves necessity or benefit to the tarwad: A. I. R. 1915 Mad. 307; 16 I.C. 391 and 21 I. C. 1007, Foll. [P 251 C 2]

The surrender of a term of a kanom and its renewal as from the date of the surrender does not affect the principle [P 254 C 2]

(b) Malabar Law—Kanom—Grant of melcharth—Proof of necessity—Reasonable inquiry as to its existence—Extent of inquiry explained.

The melcharth-holder should show that there was necessity for the melcharth and that he satisfied himself by reasonable inquiries as to the existence of such a necessity. Ordinarily, it is enough if he satisfies himself that there is a pre existing debt and he is not bound to pursue his inquiries and find out if there was a necessity for that debt. It is not enough however that he inquired of the karnavan granting the melcharth and rested content with the statement made by him. Where a member of the tarwad has already notified that the impending alienation is improper it is his duty to make inquiries of such member. [P 255 C 1]

C. V. Ananthakrishna Aiyar—for Appellant.

T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—The plaintiff in the suit from which this appeal has been preferred is a senior Anandravan of the tarwad of which defendant 2 is the karnavan. Defendant 1 holds a kanom, Ex. 2 in the case, executed on 24th August 1914. The object of the suit is to have that kanom set aside on the ground that it was an imprudent transaction and was injurious to the interests of the tarwad. Defendant 1, who is the karnavan of a rich tarwad, has had dealings with defendant 2's tarwad for a long time prior to the suit. He holds kanoms and melcharths on large properties belonging to defendant 2's tarwad including the property in dispute.

In order to understand the questions arising in the case, it is necessary only to go back to Ex. 20 which is a melcharth in favour of defendant 1 in respect of the property comprised in Ex. 2 executed in May 1916. The melcharth therefore which is a sort of second charge, would expire in 1908. In 1902 defendant 2's predecessor executed in favour of defendant 1's predecessor a puramkadam—that is a second charge—on receiving a fee of about Rs. 1,350. That document contains a stipulation for renewal of the melcharth, Ex. 20. Then, disputes arose between the parties not merely with respect to this property but also with respect to properties belonging to defendant 2's tarwad in possession of defendant 1. A notice was given by defendant 2 in 1914 to defendant 1 asking the latter to surrender the property comprised in Ex. 20. There had been two suits instituted with respect to other properties of defendant 2's tarwad in possession of defendant 1. All these disputes it appears were arranged to be settled by the mediation of certain pleaders practising at the Palghat Bar, and in the result, Exs. 2 and 3 were executed. It appears that altogether Rs. 3,000 was paid by defendant 1 to defendant 2, out of which Rs. 1,000 was the fee for renewal. The case of the plaintiff is that Ex. 2 is a renewal of Ex 21 which was to expire only some time in 1920. It was strongly contended by Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar for the appellant that we must ignore Ex. 21, altogether, as that was disputed by the parties and as Ex. 2 was executed under an arrangement arrived at by way of compromise. But the whole case tried before the Court was that Ex. 2 was executed before the expiry of the term mentioned in Ex. 21 and therefore it was invalid unless defendant 1 was able to show that the transaction was for the benefit of the family or was entered into for a necessary purpose. The document Ex. 2, itself states that

"though a period of five years and eight Months has yet to expire of the former puramkadom demise for 12 years (meaning thereby Ex. 21), yet we have to-day given you this demise for 12 years as we are pressed for payment of the amount on the pronote with interest thereon executed to M. K. Krishna menon."

The written statement of defendant 1, para. 1, also proceeds on the same basis and the evidence of defendant 1 himself is to that effect. And the question raised by issu 1, the issue bearing on the point is:

"whether the demise, Ex. 2, was valid and binding on the tarwad in view of the fact that defendant 1 has surrendered his prior demise before he took this demise."

By the prior demise here is meant the puramkadam Ex 21. I think it would be altering the entire case if we were now to accede to Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar's contention that Ex. 21 must be ignored altogether and that we must hold that since the term in Ex. 20 expired in 1908, Ex. 2 should not be treated as a transaction entered into before the expiry of an existing demise.

Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar has next argued that since there were disputes between the parties as to the validity of Ex. 21 and also about other transactions and as Ex. II was executed in settlement of those disputes, no question of necessity or benefit to the tarwad arises in connexion with Ex. 2 at all. But the suit raises the question, not whether Ex. 2 is binding on defendant 2, but whether it binds the tarwad of which defendant 2 is the karnavan. Ex. 2 was executed long before the expiry of the term of Ex. 21. The contention on behalf of the plaintiff is that defendant 1 must prove either necessity or benefit to the tarwad. I do not think that the fact that defendant 2 executed Ex. 2 under the mediation of some persons would by itself relieve defendant 1 in the circumstances of the case from making out that this is a transaction which is binding on the tarwad. The defendant did not attempt to make a case before the trial Court that the transaction should be upheld on the ground that it was part of the terms of a bona fide settlement of disputes. If he had set up such a defence, the nature of the entire dispute, would have to be looked into. All facts which will show that it was a bona fide settlement should have been placed before the Court. It has been ruled in more than one case that if a melcharth is granted before the expiry of the term of the kanom, the melcharth-holder must prove necessity or benefit to the tarwad: see Raman Nambiar v. Raman Nambiar (1), Cheria Chirikandan v. Krishnan Nambiar (2), and Moidin Kuti v. Kunhi Koyan (3). In the first two cases Sundara Aiyar, J and Sadasiva Aiyar, J. who had considerable experience of Malabar law and litigation, took part. In fact Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar has not seriously contended that these rulings are wrong.

But his argument upon which he has insisted a great deal is that the rule regarding the grant of a melcharth has no application to the renewal of a kanom. A melcharth is what is granted to a person other than the kanomdar or tenant, while if a kanon is renewed to the holder of the kanom himself that is a case of renewal. The ground upon which the rule relating to melcharth has been based is two-fold:—firstly, if a kanomdar grants a melcharth before the expiry of the term of the kanom, he is practically fettering the discretion of the person who may hold the office at the time of the expiry of the kanom. Secondly, it is not possible always to ascertain beforehand what would be fair and reasonable terms for the melcharth before the kanom has expired. Both these considerations seem to apply with equal force in the case of renewals, i. e., where a kanom is renewed before the expiry of its term. Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar argues that there is no rule prohibiting the surrender of a portion of the term of a kanom and that in fact such a surrender would be beneficial to the tarwad. I am not prepared to say that the surrender of a portion of the term must necessarily be beneficial to the tarwad; but even supposing it to be so, the grant of another kanom which would expire after the date of the expiry of the term of the original kanom would come within the purview of the ruling relating to melcharth and the same considerations would apply. The question shortly put is, why should a karnavan be in a hurry to renew a kanom before its term expires. If he can show that there was necessity to renew the kanom at that stage or that it was for the benefit of the tarwad that he should do so, that would be sufficient justification. I think therefore that the principle of the rulings above cited applies to this case, and this is also the view of the Subordinate Judge who is presumably familiar with the Malabar law. Then remains the question whether Ex. 2 is a valid transaction. Defendant 1 has not been able to prove actual necessity, but his real case has been that he made bona fide inquiries before obtaining Ex. 2 and that he was satisfied after such inquiry that necessity existed for the transaction in question.

(1) A. I. R. 1915 Mad. 307=25 I. C. 578.

(3) A. I. R. 1915 Mad. 650=27 I. C. 1007.

What are the exact limits of the enquiry which a person obtaining a transfer or advancing money to a person in the position of a karnavan, whose position is very much analogous to that of a manager of an ordinary Hindu family is required by law to make are not capable of being defined for all cases. But I think it is amply clear from the authorities that it is not only enough for the alienee to show that he made inquiries of the karnavan himself and that he was satisfied with the statements made by him. If that was all that was wanted, there would be hardly any case in wich it would not be possible for the alienee to satisfy the letter of the law. In Kameswar Prashad v. Run Bahadur Singh (4) Sir James Colvile, delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, says that "their Lordships in no degree depart from the principles laid down in the case of Hunoomanpersaud Panday v. Mt. Babooee Munraj Koonweree (5) which has been so often cited. They have applied those principles in recent cases not only to the case of a manager for an infant, which was the case there, but to transactions on all fours with the present, namely, alienations by a widow, and to transactions in which a father, in derogation of the rights of his son under the Mitakshara law has made an alienation of ancestral family estate. The principle broadly laid down is, that although the lender is not bound to see to the application of the money, and does not lose his rights if, upon a bona fide inquiry, he has been deceived as to the existence of the necessity which he had reasonable grounds for supposing to exist, he still is under an obligation to do certain things."

"Their Lordships think that the lender is bound to inquire into the necessities for the loan and to satisfy himself as well as he can, with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate; but they think that if he does so inquire and acts honestly, the real existence of an alleged sufficient and reasonably credited necessity is not a condition precedent to the validity of his charge, and they do not think that, under such circumstances, he is bound to see to the application of the money . . . ."

Their Lordships do not think that a bona fide creditor should suffer when he has acted honestly and with due caution, but is himself deceived. The same principle was applied in Ravaneshwar Prasad Singh v. Chandi Prasad Singh (6), which was confirmed by the Privy Council on appeal. At page 751 (of I. L. R. 38 Cal.) it is pointed out that the inquiry was wholly insufficient and could not be said to be bona fide on the ground, among others, that the Maharajah of Durbhanga, who was the alienee there, merely satisfied himself with the enquiries made of his servants and did not make enquiries of the creditors and the heirs, and that it was not sufficient merely to ask the debtor if he was borrowing for necessity and to be satisfied with his answers. In this case it is alleged that there was a debt of Rs. 3,000 outstanding on a promissory note executed by defendant 2 to one Kutti Krishna Menon. The evidence is that defendant 1 and his pleader made enquiries of defendant 2 as well as of Kutti Krishna Menon. The promissory note was for Rs. 3,000 and part of the amount, at any rate, is alleged to have been borrowed for the purpose of repairing a temple belonging to the defendant 2's tarwad and for the performance of the purification ceremony after the repairs. This Kutti Krishna Menon is a close relation of defendant 2, being his son's first cousin. The note was executed shortly before Ex. 2. Defendant 1 is a neighbour of defendant 2 and as he has had money dealings with him he may well be presumed to have some knowledge of his affairs. Now, the real point as regards this is that the plaintiff, the senior anandravan of the tarwad, a few days before the transaction had given a notice (Ex. C) to defendant 1 that defendant 2 was trying to execute documents to the injury of the tarwad and to raise money for the purposes of his own extravagance. He also sent him a notice which he had published in a vernacular paper, and there it was stated that defendant 2 wanted to execute a renewal which was not for the benefit of the tarwad nor was there any necessity for it. In spite of these notices, defendant 1, who is a pleader of considerable experience and standing in the profession, does not think it worth his while to refer to the plaintiff and ascertain from him how far the allegations made by him were well founded or not. The repairs of the temple were alleged to have been met by subscription from the tenants and there was no necessity therefore for borrowing any money. It ought to have also struck defendant 1 that Kutti Krishna Menon being a near relation of defendant 2, it would be safer to require some independent proof of the bona fides of the promissory note. It is difficult to understand why defendant 1 should have refrained from taking what would appear to anybody, and especially to a pleader, obvious steps for securing his position. He ought to have gone to the plaintiff and ascertained what was the true state of affairs.

The tarwad of defendant 2 consists of a large number of adult male persons and he ought to have asked some of them whether there was any necessity for defendant 2 to raise any money. I think if he had made proper inquiries, he would have learnt that the repairs of the temple were met by subscriptions from the tenants and I must hold that he should not have placed implicit reliance on the statement of defendant 2 or of Kutti Krishna Menon. I think there is great force in the argument of Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar that this payment of Rs 3,000 or of Rs. 1,000 as renewal fee for Ex. 2 could not have been for purposes of necessity, and it was more or less an afterthought that struck defendant 1 to get hold of a promissory note in favour of Kutti Krishna Menon. Kutti Krishna Menon is a wealthy man and his evidence is that he obtained Rs. 60 out of this Rs. 3,000 as consideration for an agreement not to press for the loan. There is absolutely nothing to show any sort of necessity why only a few days afterwards money had to be raised by Ex. 2 in order to pay off this loan. It is pointed out by the learned Subordinate Judge that the money alleged to have been repaid to Kutti Krishna Menon was not invested in any better security or to any greater advantage, but in fact it was lent to a bank at a lower rate of interest than under Ex. 1. I think the conclusion of the Subordinate Judge was amply justified that necessity is not proved or that any benefit accrued to the tarwad from Ex. 2. It appears that defendant 2 is an old man and it is not at all unlikely, having regard to the fact that there are several tavazhis in this tarwad, that he wanted to enrich his own family at the expense of the tarwad of which he was the karnavan. It seems to me that if defendant 1 had made proper inquiries, he would have found out that there was no necessity whatever for executing Ex. 2. On the other hand, it seems to me extremely probable, as suggested by Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar, that this transaction was really a term of the settlement of certain disputes with respect to other properties in respect of which suits were pending and that it was not a transaction entered into for purposes of tarwad necessity. As already pointed out, it was not sought to be proved that, apart from the question of benefit or necessity, the settlement was binding on the tarwad.

There has been much discussion before us as to a recital in Ex. 2 in respect of the value of certain improvements amounting to Rs. 400 to Rs. 800, which is made payable along with the mortgage money secured by Ex. 2. Those improvements, it is abundantly clear, had already been paid for by defendant 2's tarwad, and therefore nothing was due on that account. Defendant 1, when in the witness box, gave up his claim saying at the same time that he was not satisfied that the improvements had been paid for. I think there can be no doubt whatever that the case of the plaintiff on this point is perfectly true and is borne out by Ex. D, the draft of which Ex. E was corrected by defendant 1 himself. It is however possible that at the time of ths execution of Ex. 2 defendant 1 had forgotten what was stated in Ex. D and therefore it is unnecessary for me to hold that the recital regarding the improvements in Ex. 2 was deliberately false. However, in view of my finding that there was no necessity for the execution of Ex. 2 at all, I do not think it necessary to discuss this part of the case any further. I agree with the finding of the Subordinate Judge that Ex. 2 is not valid and binding on defendant 2's tarwad and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—I would have simply expressed my concurrence with my learned brother's judgment, had it not been for the fact that I am unable to agree unreservedly with what he says regarding the conduct of defendant 1. Therefore I shall say a few words on the two questions of law argued by Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar with special reference to the conduct of defendant 1. I entirely agree in thinking that the document should not be regarded solely as the result of a compromise. There is no issue upon that question. If that question had been raised, there would have been a necessity to go into the evidence as to whether defendant 1 was acting honestly in putting forward the claim that Ex. 21 is not binding upon the tarwad. Therefore it is not open to the defendauts now to set up that case. Upon the further question argued by Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar that there was a surrender of the previously existing kanom and that the renewed kanom which dates from the date of the surrender is not affected by the same mischief which affects a melcharth or renewal which is to take effect on the expiry of the existing kanom, I fail to see how on principle the two questions are different. The reason why the melcharths are discountenanced under the Malabar law is this: there is an existing contract which the karnavan has made which is binding on the tarwad. It has a particular term to run. It is not therefore open to a karnavan to anticipate the term and to get a new contract executed without showing that there was necessity for making a new contract.

When the old kanom expires, there may be a new man who will be able to apply his mind to the circumstances arising at the end of the period. He may probably think that the old tenant should not be given the kanom again; or he may also think that it would be necessary in the interests of the tarwad that fresh terms should be imposed upon the old tenant. Therefore it is not ordinarily open to a karnavan to anticipate what is going to happen some years after. It is a well-known fact in Malabar that melcharths and renewals are given mostly in the personal interest of the karnavan for the time being who is anxious to enrich himself at the expense of the tarwad. Those are the grounds on which these transactions have been discountenanced by Courts, and I fail to see how the fact that there is a surrender of the existing period and the kanom is made to date from the date of the surrender could make any difference in the principles to be applied. Therefore I agree with my learned brother in thinking that as in this case there was some time still to run for Ex. 21, the fact that the period was surrendered and a new kanom was taken on that date, should not make any difference in considering the question.

Upon the second question I do not go the whole length which my learned brother has gone. I see nothing in the conduct of defendant 1 to show that he has not been acting honestly and bona fide. In my opinion he bas been mistaken in judging of his rights and duties. There were two suits, one in which he was himself the plaintiff and the other in which he was the defendant. A notice had been given by defendant 2, impeaching the validity of the kanom by his predecessors; in these circumstances defendant asked his own vakil and the vakil for defendant 2 to settle the dispute between the parties. He apparently relied upon their mediation and entered into this arrangement. Now it may be that he felt himself very sure of his position and did not make any further inquiries. But I do not think it can be said that he shirked any inquiry or acted otherwise than honestly in this matter. In my opinion the evidence which has been given is entirely to his credit, and there is nothing suggested in the cross examination to show that he was acting fraudulently or was not behaving properly towards defendant 2, who is said to be an old man. After all it must be remembered that defendant 1, although a vakil, was acting in the interests of his own tarwad which he was bound to protect. In these circumstances I am not prepared to say that he was acting otherwise than honestly and bona fide in conducting the negotiations. At the same time I am prepared to agree with my learned brother that the inquiry which he instituted was not sufficient in the eye of the law to justify the transaction. As has been pointed out by my learned brother, at the time of the transaction two notices were sent to defendant 1, Ex. C and Ex. L. Ordinarily it would be enough for a lender to be satisfied that there is a pre-existing debt, for, if a lender is to be compelled to find out that that debt also was one contracted for necessity and if that is to be insisted upon in the case of each loan, the result would be that the lender would have to go back a number of years and to investigate the affairs of the family from the outset.

I do not think that is what the law requires of him to do. Nonetheless when defendant 1 had the notices from plaintiff 2 that the money he was going to lend to defendant was for the latter's personal use and would not bind the tarwad, it was his duty to have gone to that person and made inquiries as to whether the representations made in the notices were true or not. His failure to make further inquiries was certainly wrong and certainly not legally justifiable. I think Ravaneshwar Prasad Singh v. Chandi Prasad Singh (6) lays down the principles applicable to the present case. I do not understand the decision to rule that in all cases where a man is lending to pay off a pre existing debt, the lender must not only satisfy himself that there is a debt but that the debt is also one binding on the family. As I said before, in my opinion, defendant 1 apparently believed that the mediation of the two vakils was sufficient to enable him to lend the money; I do not think that he can be said to have acted dishonestly or not to have acted bona fide in having taken the renewal. As regards the question about the insertion of the further charge in the document for improvement, the same remarks would apply here also. I am unable to agree with Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar that there was anything sinister in the conduct of defendant 1 in getting this provision for a further charge inserted in Ex. 2. The first document which he attested, Ex D, was in 1898 and 16 years later he took this document, Ex. 2, from defendant 2 after the mediation of the two vakils. He may say that he was under the impression that the money was not paid and he has sworn to the fact that his karnavan, Thoppan Nayar, did not receive the money. I see no reason for not believing the evidence given by him in the witness-box. It is unnecessary to pursue this subject further because, in my opinion, if the matter rested only with Ex. 2, I would have come to the conclusion that the two transactions were entirely separable. But as I have come to the conclusion that no necessity or benefit to the tarwad is proved by defendant 1 in respect of Ex. 2, it is unnecessary to say whether the second clause should be regarded as a clog on the equity of redemption and whether it would be valid and binding on the tarwad.

I agree in the conclusion come to by my learned brother that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Where the powers of a guardian for the property of a minor cease, owing to the minor's death, the Court has jurisdiction, under S. 41 (3) to pass an order directing the guardian to deliver the property of the minor to the latter's heir. [P 256 C 1]

(b) Guardians and Wards Act (1890), S. 41 (3)—Words "for any cause" include death of minor."

"The words "for any cause" in S. 41 (3) are not confined to the causes mentioned in Cls. (1) and (2) of the section and the death of the minor is also a "cause" which puts an end to the powers of the guardian within the meaning of the expression "any cause." [P 256 C 1, 2]

(c) Guardians and Wards Act (1890), S. 41 (3)—"Property belonging to ward" explained.

The expression "property belonging to the ward" in the same clause includes property which belonged to the person who was a ward though, by the cessation of his minority or by his death, he has ceased to be a ward. [P 256 C 2]

Oldfield, J.—The lower Court's order was passed ou the death of a minor to whose property it had appointed a guardian, and directed the handing over of the property by that guardian to one of those, who claimed as the deceased minor's heir. It is urged, first, that it had no power to pass such an order and should have directed the guardian to institute an interpleader suit. But it is not shown how it had the right to give him any such direction. S. 41 (3), Guardians and Wards Act (8 of 1890) appears wide enough to cover the Court's action; and the Court in Murlidhar Natha v. Vallabhdas Murlidhar (1) appears to have acted similarly without objection being taken by the appellate Court or the parties. In these circumstances I hold that the lower Court's action was within its powers. It is then contended that the lower Court used its discretion wrongly. It had materials before it which it apparently considered, and we are not prepared to say that its discretion was not rightly exercised. The Letters Patent Appeals and the Civil Revision Petition fail and are dismissed with costs, except in Letters Patent Appeal No. 134 of 1917 in which there is no appearance.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—I feel clear in my own mind that the words in S. 41, Cl. (3), Guardians and Wards Act (8 of 1890) "for any cause" are not confined to the causes mentioned in Cls. (1) and (2) and that when the death of the minor ward occurs that also is a "cause" which puts an end to the powers of the property guardian within the meaning of the expression "any cause." I am also clear that the expression "property belonging to the ward" in the same clause includes property which belonged to the person who was a ward though by the cessation of his minority or by his death, he ceased to be a ward. That under S. 41, Cl. (3), Guardian and Wards Act, the Court has jurisdiction to pass orders where the powers of the guardian cease through the minors' death seems to have been assumed as a matter of course in the case of Murlidhar Natha v. Vallabhdas Murlidhar (1). I agree therefore that these appeals and the Civil Revision Petition should be dismissed with costs as regards Letters Patent Appeal No. 133 of 1917 and Civil Revision Petition No. 587 of 1917.

Judgment.—The case lies in a small compass. The petitioner appellant did not mention in a previous execution application an alleged payment towards the decree, which had not been certified to the Court. The question is whether in this respect the application was in accordance with law with reference to Art. 182, Sch. 1, Lim. Act. Reading O. 21, R. 1 (1), Civil P. The Court should also take care, when passing a decree setting aside a transfer even in a single creditor's suit, to adopt Form No. 13 in App. D, Civil P. C. [P 259 C 2]

K. Ramanatha Shenai—for Appellant.

C. Madhavan Nair and B. Pocker—for Respondents.

Ayling, J.—In this case the lower appellate Court seems to me to have erred in supposing that unless the contested sale deed, Ex. 5, is merely a sham transaction, the present suit is not maintainable. The ruling quoted [Palaniandi Chetty v. Appavu Chettiar (1)], if examined, does not support such a view; nor does the later Full Bench ruling [Subramani Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2)] which considered the same question, and to which I was a party.

What was decided in these cases was this; that, where the validity of an alienation is impugned on the ground that it offends against S. 53, T. P. Act, that alienation must be uphold until it is set aside in proceedings properly instituted for the purpose. The exact nature of the proceedings which should be instituted was not determined. In Palaniandi Chetty v. Appavu Chettiar (1) Coutts-Trotter, J., expressed the opinion that a creditor suing to set aside an alienation on this ground must do so on behalf of all creditors, unless (as in the case before us) he was a judgment-creditor who had taken attachment in execution of his decree. This view was dissented from by the other learned Judge, Seshagiri Aiyar, J. and the Full Bench expressly left the point undecided. No other light is thrown on the nature of the proceedings by either judgment.

What we have therefore to consider is whether the present suit should be treated as one properly instituted for the purpose of setting aside the assignment deed Ex. 5. It was brought by plaintiff under O. 21, R. 63, Civil P. C. Defendant 1 had preferred a claim to the property attached by plaintiff, based on Ex. 5, which had been allowed under O. 21, R. 60. Plaintiff therefore brought this suit, as he was bound to do by O. 21, R. 63, to establish the right which he claimed of bringing the property to sale, as that of his judgment-debtors. Whether it was the judgment-debtor's property or not depends solely on whether Ex. 5 be upheld or set aside. The suit directly raises, and actually turns upon, the validity of the assignment by Ex. 5, and in my opinion, it must be regarded as one properly instituted to set aside that transaction. That the plaint only asks in terms for a declaration that the property is liable to sale in execution of the decree is immaterial. The form the suit has taken is determined by the peculiar position held by plaintiff. The law declares that an attaching decree-holder against whom the claim of a third party is allowed must sue within a year of the date of the order to establish his right; failing which the latter is extinguished. It puts him in a specially unfavourable position as regards limitation as compared with an ordinary creditor; but on the other hand, in prescribing the exact nature of his remedy it frees him from any other restrictions as to the nature of the suit to be brought which the latter may labour under.

It seems to me impossible to hold that as appellant's counsel contends, he is bound to bring two suits, one in his individual capacity under O. 21, R. 63, to save himself from limitation, and another as a representative of the whole body of creditors impugning the validity of the alienation. Quite apart from the provisions of O. 21, R. 63, the exceptional position of a judgment-creditor is generally recognized even in English law; vide 15 Halsbury 89. In Palaniandi Chetty v. Appavu Chettiar (1) Coutts-Trotter, J. points out the distinction; and although it was ignored by the learned Judges in Hakim Lal v. Mooshahar Sahu (3), this may have been because the point was not raised and the decision of the case proceeded on altogether different grounds. Our attention has been drawn to no case in which a suit by an attaching judgment-creditor was dismissed simply because it was not brought in a representative capacity. Whether an ordinary creditor who seeks to set aside an alienation as infringing S. 53, T. P. Act, must sue in a representative capacity we are not called upon to say. I must not be understood to hold that he is under any such obligation. The present suit is, in my opinion, certainly not liable to dismissal on account of any defect of form; and on the concurrent findings of fact arrived at by both the lower Courts plaintiff is entitled to a decree. I can see no ground for questioning these findings or for holding that defendants should have been allowed further opportunity of adducing evidence. I would therefore dismiss the second appeal with costs.

Krishnan, J.—I agree with my learned brother that this second appeal fails. But as the point raised by the appellant's advocate Mr. Shenai, as to the necessity of bringing a representative suit under S. 53, T. P. Act, is an important one and has been argued at some length before us, I shall add a few words. Both the lower Courts found on the evidence in the case that Ex. 5, the sale deed in favour of the appellant, was intended to defeat the vendor's creditors of which plaintiff was one and that the appellant was not a transferee in good faith. The Subordinate Judge went further and found that the sale was a sham or colourable transaction which was void and did not require to be avoided. This last finding has been attacked before us and it is difficult to support it on the facts of the case. But, in my view, it is an unnecessary finding and may be ignored, as the sale deed was properly treated as unenforceable against the plaintiff on the other two findings. It was however argued by Mr. Shenai that a creditor was not entitled to avoid a transfer under S. 53, Transfer of Property Act, unless he had brought a representative suit on behalf of all the creditors and got a decree setting aside the deed. He contended that as this was not such a suit, we must ignore the findings as to the fraudulent character of Ex. 5 and treat it as in force and dismiss the plaintiff's suit. The result of his contention, if adopted, will be that we should be driven to uphold a sale deed which has been proved to be fraudulent and voidable at plaintiff's option, and enforce it against him simply because he has not brought what is called a representative suit. Such a result seems somewhat startling, but Mr. Shenai contended that his proposition was supported by decided cases both in this country and in England; we must therefore examine the authorities relied on.

(3) [1907] 34 Cal. 999.

It is conceded that there is no statutory rule on the point.

Mr. Shenai relied in the first instance on the English rule regarding cases under the Statute of Elizabeth, 13, Elizabeth Ch. 5; the provisions of that Statute are practically the same as that of S. 53, T. P. Act on this point. The English rule,as stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 15, p. 89, is as follows:

"In an action to set aside an alienation under the Statute a creditor should sue on behalf of himself and all other the creditors of the grantor, except where he has recovered judgment for his debt, in which case he can obtain an order declaring the alienation as void against him and containing consequential directions for the satisfaction of his debt alone, without mention of any other creditors or their debts."

As pointed out by Coutts-Trotter, J., in Palaniandi Chetty v. Appavu Chettiar (1), the equity Courts used to insist that after getting a judgment in his favour the creditor should sue out a writ of fifa or elegit before seeking their help to set aside a deed of transfer in equitable execution of his decree. If we adopt the rule in the restricted manner with the execution as above stated, the present suit will be a validly constituted one as it is by a judgment-creditor who has attached immoveable property, which corresponds in a general way to suing out the writ of elegit. Apart from that, it has not been shown that the rule itself was ever used for the purpose of dismissing a suit by a single creditor. No authority has been cited where such a procedure was followed in England. The cases cited in support of the rule, viz., Bott v. Smith (4), Mouatt, In re; Kingston Cotton Mill Co. v. Mouatt (5), Cornish v. Clark (6), Ideal Bedding Co. v. Holland (7) and Reese River Silver Mining Co. v. Atwell (8), when examined, show either that the suit was brought by the plaintiff himself on behalf of all the creditors or, as happened in the last case cited, the suit was allowed to be amended for the purpose in the trial Court. On the contrary in the case of Maddever, In re; Three Towns Banking Co. v. Maddever (9), though the suit was by a single creditor, no objection was apparently taken as to its form, but the decree gave, as a matter of form, a declaration that the conveyance in question was void against the plaintiff and all other if any, creditors of the debtor. It seems to me therefore that even in cases of ordinary creditors where the rule applied and not the exception, suits were not dismissed for not being brought on behalf of all the creditors, but were allowed to be amended in the trial Court or where the transfer was to be set aside, a decree was passed setting it aside on behalf of all the creditors.

As the provisions in the Statute of Elizabeth and S. 53, T. P. Act, are practically the same, we may well adopt the English rule as a whole, but without giving any further scope to it either by allowing objections to the form of the suit being taken in appeal for the first time or by dismissing the suit because it is not in a representative character. As pointed out by Coutts-Trotter, J., in the case in Palaniandi Chetty v. Appavu Chettiar (1), already cited, the rule has already been, to some extent, adopted in India. There are indications in the Indian law to show that a creditor may bring a suit under S. 53, T. P. Act, in his individual character without joining the other creditors or suing on their behalf. The wording of S. 53 itself gives to each individual creditor who has been defeated or delayed a right to treat as voidable at his option a transfer that falls within it. He has not got to exercise his option in conjunction with the co-creditors. He thus gets a cause of action for himself and there is nothing in the Code of Civil Procedure to prevent him from seeking relief by himself.

Again, it would seem from the wording of the form of the decree under the Civil Procedure Code in a suit to set aside a transfer in fraud of creditors, see Form No. 13, Sch. 1, App. D, a suit to which all the creditors are not parties either personally or otherwise is contemplated; for the form of the decree in Re Maddever's case (9) above cited is adopted. The use of the words "if any" shows that all the creditors are not before the Court.

I am therefore of opinion that there is no rule either in the English or in the Indian law justifying the dismissal of a suit brought under S. 53, T. P. Act, because it is not brought in a representative capacity. To avoid the difficulty of multiplicity of suits pointed out by Coutts Trotrer, J., in Palaniandi Chetty v. Appavu Chettiar (1), I think the trial Court may, of its own motion, and should, if moved by the transferee-defendant, direct that a suit by a single creditor under S. 53, T. P. Act, should be amended so as to make it a suit on behalf of all the creditors, as was directed to be done in Ishvar Timappa Hegde v. Devar Venkappa Shanbog (10). The Court should also take care, when passing a decree setting aside a transfer even in a a single creditor's suit, to adopt the Form No. 13 in Appn. D above referred to. But if a suit had been proceeded with, without any objection being taken to its form on the ground of its not being on behalf of all the creditors and a decree had been passed setting aside a transfer as fraudulent, it seems to me that there is no justification for allowing such an objection to be raised for the first time in appeal or for ignoring the findings arrived at by the lower Court and dismissing the suit as not being of a representative character. Such a course will make the Court really an instrument for the support of a proved fraud.

I shall now refer to the Indian cases relied on by Mr. Shenai. To start with, he relied on the Madras cases reported as Palaniandi Chetty v. Appavu Chettiar (1) and in Subramania Ayyar v. Muthia Chettiar (2). The latter case is a Full Bench decision. The point decided in both these cases was that a defendant to an action cannot plead in defence his right to avoid a transfer under S. 53, T. P. Act; and that if he wishes to exercise his option under that section, he can do so only as a plaintiff and not as a defendant. If this question were res integra, I should find some difficulty in adopting this view. But it is not necessary to discuss it as the question before us now is quite different. The creditor here is not seeking to set up his right as a plea in defence but he has come to Court as a plaintiff and the question raised is, whether he should do so in a representative suit only. On that question I consider that neither case is an authority. In the judgment in the Full Bench case, this question has been expressly excluded from consideration. No doubt, there is an observation in it that the sale should be set aside "in proceedings properly instituted for the purpose." There is however no indication in the judgment what these proceedings are and as my learned brother who made the observation considers that the present suit is such a proceeding, it cannot be relied on as an authority against the respondent.

If Palaniandi Chetty's case (1) is examined, it will be found that Seshagiri Aiyar. J., definitely ruled that no representative suit was necessary. The view of Coutts Trotter, J., on the point is not quite clear; but it seems to be that a representative suit is necessary except in the case of attaching decree-holders. The difficulty in understanding his view arises from the fact that he apparently overlooked that the case before him was that of a decree-holder who had not only attached property but had obtained an order in his favour in the claim petition. From his judgment it would appear that he would have supported the decree in the case if he had not treated it as one of a mere decree-holder. However that may be, if the learned Judge is to be taken as holding that a creditor's suit should be dismissed in second appeal if it is not brought in a representative capacity, with all respect, I am unable to follow him. I am inclined to agree with the view of Seshagiri Aiyar, J., on this point, though I am doubtful about his wiew as to the applicability of S. 11, Expl. 6, Civil P. C., for in a case which ends in favour of the transferees it may be difficult to hold that the creditors who were no parties to the suit are also barred from disputing the validity of the transfer. The other cases relied on by Mr. Shenai are Burjorji Dorabji Patel v. Dhunbai (11), Ishvar Timappa Hegde v. Devar Venkappa Shanbog (10), Hakim Lal v. Mooshahar Sahu (3) and Chatterput Singh v. Maharaj Bahadur (12). The last one is a Privy Council ruling and the observation relied on is on p. 217:

"such an issue could be raised and such a decree could be made only in a suit properly constituted for that purpose and this suit was not so constituted either as to parties or otherwise."

There is nothing to show that their Lordships meant by a properly constituted suit a representative suit; they do not say so. The facts of the case show that proper allegations had not been made and proper parties, viz., the transferors, had not been joined to enable the Court to set aside Chatturput's private purchase as fraudulent. The observation referred to is apparently connected with these circumstances. I am therefore not able to treat it as an authority on the point before us. The observation in the next Calcutta case on p. 1106 (of I. L. R. 34 Cal). is no doubt in point in appellant's favour; but as the decision in the case was that the conveyance was a valid one and not liable to be set aside under S. 53 T. P. Act, they are in the nature of obiter dicta. It was also pointed out to us that the learned Judges had not noticed the exception recognized in the English Law to the general rule in favour of the attaching decree-holder, though the case before them was one of such a decree-holder. With every respect I am unable to follow their view that a suit under S. 53, T. P. Act, is liable to be dismissed if not brought in a representative capacity. They have also not expressed a definite opinion whether the objection should be allowed to be raised for the first time in appeal, though they were apparently inclined to hold that it should not. As I have already stated, I am also of the same opinion that it should not be allowed.

I have already referred to the case in Ishvar Timappa Hegde v. Devar Venkappa Shanbog (10) and I am in agreement with the learned Judges there that suitable amendments may be directed by the trial Court to make a suit brought by a single creditor under S. 53, T. P. Act, a representative suit. The actual decision in that case was that a creditor who has not obtained a decree in his favour is nevertheless entitled to sue under that section. In the case in Barjorji Dorabji Patel v. Dhunbai (11) the suit was not dismissed on the ground of its not being a representative suit, though no doubt the learned Judge was of opinion that the suit was liable to be dismissed on that ground. This opinion however was really only an obiter dictum, for it was found by him that plaintiffs were claiming under the transferor himself and could not therefore impeach his transfer. It was not a case of creditors at all and was not under S. 53, T. P. Act, as the Act did not then apply to Bombay. As already pointed out, the English authorities the learned Judge follows do not show that the suit should be dismissed if not brought in a representative character. I do not therefore consider that this case which, it will be noted, is the decision of a single Judge, is an authority against the view I am taking and which I should follow.

I have thus, for the reasons above stated, come to the conclusion that even looking upon plaintiff as no more than an ordinary creditor of the vendor, the appellant's contention that we should now dismiss his suit should be overruled. In my view the Subordinate Judge was wrong in allowing the point to be raised for the first time in appeal. In this case however the decree of the lower Court can be supported on a much narrower ground as well; for the plaintiff here is not merely a creditor but an attaching decree-holder who was the defeated party in a claim petition filed by the transferee-defendant under O. 21, R. 60, Civil P. C. I have already pointed out that adopting the English rule he will have, as attaching decree-holder, a personal right to sue by himself to avoid the transfer. Again as the defeated party in a claim petition he has a statutory right of suit given to him under R. 63 and that suit must necessarily be one brought by himself alone and is not a representative suit.

Under that rule he can sue to establish the right which he claims to the property in dispute, and that right is that it can be attached and sold for his decree. The present suit is exactly that suit and it cannot therefore be defeated by any rule of practice which has no statutory basis. As it is necessary to find whether Ex. 5 is valid against him to give him the relief claimed, the Court, I think, was bound to decide that question and he could not be referred to another suit for the purpose. In fact the suggestion of the appellant's counsel that after bringing this suit plaintiff should have at once launched another suit of a representative character to set aside Ex. 5 and get a stay of this suit pending that suit, if he wanted to save it from dismissal, does not seem to me to be at all reasonable nor the course proposed necessary; it is perhaps even impracticable; I do not see why plaintiff should be driven to bring two suits for the same purpose. To hold that plaintiff cannot get the deed set aside except in a representative suit will be a practical denial of his statutory right of suit, a suit which he has to bring, as pointed out by my learned brother, within one year at the risk of losing his right to attach his property if he does not do so.

The only case cited to us which was a case of an attaching decree holder defeated in a claim petition suing, is the one in Hakim Lal v. Mooshahar Sahu (3) already referred to. But in that case the learned Judges did not consider his special and peculiar right to sue in his own name under R. 63. I have already stated that I am unable to follow their view as to the character of the suit to be brought under S. 53. It is therefore no authority against the respondent. I agree with my learned brother that the appellant's contention that the present suit should be dismissed because it was not a representative suit on behalf of all the creditors fails and that the lower Courts were right on their findings in holding that Ex. 5 was not valid against the plaintiff and in giving relief on that footing. I agree the second appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 1849 of 1917, Decided on 27th November 1918, against decree of Dist. Judge, Ramnad, in Appeal Suit No. 404 of 1916.

(a) Paper Currency Act (1910), S. 26, Proviso—Hundi payable on demand to bearer can be made to be drawn on bank against intended deposit— Negotiable Instruments Act (1881), Ss 120 and 122.

Where a hundi is drawn on a banker, an intended deposit before the presentation would save the hundi under the proviso to S. 26, Paper Currency Act:

Defendant 1 drew a hundi on a Rangoon firm in which at the top he was described as the debtor and defendant 3 as the creditor. The material portion of the hundi was as follows: "The money which Rangoon current rate of interest should be paid on demand to the person who brings this by the Rangoon firm." Defendant 1 had no money with the firm when he drew the hundi, but intended to make a deposit before presentation:

Held: that the hundi was covered by the proviso to S. 26 and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the basis of it: 36 I. C. 741, Expl. and Dist. [P 262 C 2]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.— The policy of the proviso to S. 26, Paper Currency Act is to enable bona fide customers to operate on actual or intended deposits. There is nothing against public policy in so doing and a hundi can be drawn on a bank against an intended deposit. [P 263 C 1]

(b) Evidence Act (1872), S. 115—Negotiable instrument.

The endorser of a negotiable instrument is estopped as against the endorsee from disputing the validity of the instrument. [P 632 C 2]

C. S. Venkatachariar—for Appellants.

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar and Patanjali Sastri—for Respondents.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—This is a suit by an endorsee of a Hundi. On 9th April 1914 defendant 1 drew the Hundi, Ex. A, on a Rangoon firm. At the top of the Hundi defendant 3 is described as the creditor and defendant 1 as the debtor. The exact rendering of the Hundi omitting unnecessary portions is

"the money with Rangoon current rate of interest should be paid on demand to the person who brings this, by the Rangoon firm."

This was signed by defendant 1. Subsequently defendant 3 put his signature by way of endorsement. Plaintiffs lent to defendant 1 on the strength of the endorsement. Hence the suit. The defence was that the debt was discharged, and that as the Hundi offended against the provisions of the Paper Currency Act the suit is not maintainable. The Courts below held that the Hundi was not discharged. They came to the conclusion, relying upon Chidambaram Chettiar v. Ayyasami Thevan (1) that the suit should be dismissed. Mr. Venkatachariar in the second appeal tried to distinguish Chidambaram Chettiar v. Ayyasami Thevan (1) from the present case on the ground that the Hundi must be regarded as not being made payable to the payee or bearer. I am unable to agree with him. The fact that the name of the payee is entered at the top of the Hundi does not matter. In effect the Hundi is drawn in favour of defendant 1 and is made payable to bearer. I think that even without the endorsement of defendant 3 the Hundi could have been presented for payment. Consequently it is obnoxious to S. 26, Paper Currency Act.

This case however is distinguishable from Chidambaram Chettiar v. Ayyasami Thevan (1) on another ground. In the first place, I think that the document in question is covered by the proviso to the section. Under it a draft can be made payable " to bearer on demand in respect of deposits of money in the hands of bankers and held at the credit and disposal of person drawing such drafts."

(1) [1916] 40 Mad. 585=36 I. C. 741.

Mr. Patanjali Sastri contended that in the present instance the Hundi should not be regarded as being drawn against a deposit of money, because on the date of the Hundi there was no money in the Rangoon firm due to defendant 1. If we turn to the admissions of defendant 1 contained in his deposition, it is clear that this contention must be overruled. He says:

" When the Hundi was drawn on it I had no money in that firm, but I had written to Saigon where I had money to send it on to the said Rangoon firm, and so I drew the Hundi on it." " My account with that firm as regards that money is not yet closed No money is due to me from that firm. The money I wanted to be sent to the Rangoon firm from Saigon was not sent. After the suit Hundi my money has gone to that firm and I have drawn it."

Notwithstanding the evident intention of defendant 1 to sell as many lies as would save him from liability, the net import of this evidence is that he drew the Hundi on money which he directed to be sent to the Rangoon firm and that after drawing the Hundi and before presentation for payment at Rangoon, he drew that money out. It is clear from this statement that the case comes within the proviso, because the draft was drawn in respect of an intended deposit of money which was expected to be held by the bankers at the credit and disposal of defendant 1. The money that apparently reached the Rangoon firm would but for the dishonest conduct of defendant 1 have been available to the plaintiffs. To hold otherwise would be to decide that when a customer draws a cheque or Hundi on a bank to which he has directed a payment to be made which would cover the draft, is guilty of an offence. The object of the proviso is to enable bona fide customers to operate on actual or intended deposits. There is nothing against public policy in so doing and I am of opinion that the Hundi was validly drawn on the bank. The subsequent misconduct of defendant 1 in drawing out the money would not invalidate it. There is another possible ground. It was not disputed that the plaintiff was a holder in due course. He had paid consideration for the Hundi before it had become payable, and without having sufficient cause to believe that any defect existed in the title of the person from whom he derived his title. Prima facie therefore defendant 1 is estopped from saying that the Hundi which he endorsed is not a valid document. Under the English Bills of Exchange Act the position of the plaintiffs would have been unassailable. S. 55, Cl. (2) (c), runs thus:

" The endorser of a bill by endorsing it is precluded from denying to his immediate or subsequent endorsee that the bill was at the time of his endorsement a valid and subsisting bill and that he had then a good title thereto."

This rule is an illustration of the principle of estoppel contained in S. 115, Evidence Act. The Indian enactment, though passed a year previous to the passing of the English Bills of Exchange Act, was apparently modelled on its provisions. In the chapter headed Special Rules of Evidence, Ss. 120 and 122 refer respectively to estoppel against makers and endorsers. S. 120 says that:

" the maker or drawer of a bill of exchange shall not be permitted in a suit thereon by a holder in due course to deny the validity of the instrument as originally made or drawn."

This would undoubtedly make defendant 1 liable. As regards the endorser S. 122 says:

" No endorser of a negotiable instrument shall in a suit thereon by a subsequent holder, be permitted to deny the signature or capacty to contract of any prior party to the instrument."

There are two noticeable differences between the two sections. One is that under the latter section, the liability incurred is not only to the holder in due course but to any holder. In the second place, the estoppel is only against denying the signature or capacity of a prior party and not against the validity of the instrument as originally made or drawn. There is no reason why there should be this distinction between the position of a drawer of a bill of exchange or the maker of a promissory note and the endorser. The English Law does not recognize such a distinction, and I am inclined to think that it is a case of inadvertent omission rather than of deliberate departure from the English rule. If we turn to S. 36 of the Act, we find that:

" every prior party to a negotiable instrument is liable thereon to a holder in due course until the instrument is duly satisfied.

Section 38 says:

"Each prior party is, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, liable thereon as a principal debtor in respect of each subsequent party."

The illustration to the section shows that the drawer will be the principal debtor and the endorser will be the surety. Ordinarily an estoppel which would apply against the principal party would also be available against the surety, unless there are circumstances such as those mentioned in S. 40, etc. Byles in his book on Bills of Exchange (16th Edn.) says at p. 180:

"The endorser makes a similar contract, and promises in the same way to compensate the holder or any subsequent endorser; he is estopped from denying to a holder in due course the genuineness and regularity in all respects of the drawer's signature, and all previous endorsements; he is estopped from denying to his immediate and any subsequent endorsee, that the bill was at the time of his endorsement a valid and subsisting bill and that he had a good title thereto."

I fail to see why this salutary principle of estoppel should not be applied in India. However, having regard to the language of S. 122, I shall not base my decision on the rule of estoppel enunciated in S. 55, Cl. (2) (c), English Act. The legislature should make this point clear. As I have held that the Hundi is covered by the proviso to S. 26, Paper Currency Act, this appeal should be allowed and the decrees of the Courts below reversed; plaintiff is entitled to a decree as prayed for and to costs in all the Courts.

Phillips, J.—I agree that the suit document comes with in the proviso to S. 26, Paper Currency Act. The finding that defendant 1 had no money with his bankers at the time he signed the Hundi is not by itself sufficient to show that he was not operating on money deposited by him with his bankers. In fact he admits that he was so operating and had given instructions for a remittance to be made to his bankers to meet the suit Hundi. The Subordinate Judge's conclusion from the mere fact no money was actually in the banker's hands when the Hundi was signed is not warranted, for it would involve the proposition that a cheque drawn payable to bearer at a time when as a matter of fact the drawer had no balance at the bank is an offence against the Paper Currency Act, although the drawer believed he had sufficient funds in the bank or intended to put the bank in funds before the cheque could be presented. The words of the proviso to S. 26 "in respect of deposits of money in the hands of the bankers" do not seem to me to warrant such a broad proposition. I therefore agree in the order proposed, and think it unnecessary to discuss the further question of estoppel.

Kasibotla Sreerama Sastrulu — Respondent.

Appeal No. 210 of 1918, and Civil Revn. Petn. No. 634 of 1918, Decided on 25th February 1919, against order of Sub-Judge, Kistna, D/- 5th August 1918, in Appeal Suit No. 683 of 1917.

 Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), Ss. 42 and 108—Small Cause Court decree transferred to Court of regular jurisdiction—Order in such execution is appealable but no second appeal will lie.

Where a decree made by a Court exercising Small Cause Court jurisdiction is transferred for execution to a Court exercising ordinary original jurisdiction, the decree by force of its transmission acquires, for the purposes of execution, all the rights which a decree passed by a Court of ordinary original jurisdiction would have. An order made in execution of such a decree is appealable, but there is no second appeal.

P Somasundaram—for Appellant.

V. Suryanarayana—for Respondent.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.— This matter arises in execution. The Subordinate Judge of Coconada exercising Small Cause Court jurisdiction passed a decree on 14th July 1905. It was transferred for execution to the District Munsif of Ellore on the regular side. This was on 20th October 1908. The last application was on 24th April 1917 On it an order to attach immovable property was made on 16th August 1917 ex parte by the District Munsif. It was set aside on the application of the judgment-debtor on 26th September 1917. On the very same day, an oral application was made to arrest the judgment-debtor. The District Munsif was asked to allow the decree-holder to amend the execution application by inserting the prayer for arrest. He declined to accede to the request and dismissed the petition altogether. An appeal was made to the Sub-Court against that order. The Subordinate Judge considered that the amendment should have been allowed. He therefore set aside the order and remanded the petition for disposal on the merits. The judgment-debtor has preferred this second appeal. A preliminary objection is taken on behalf of the respondent that no second appeal lies. I think the contention is well founded. I felt some doubts during the course of the hearing whether any appeal lay to the Sub-Court from the order of the District Munsif refusing to issue the warrant of arrest. On further consideration I have come to the conclusion that the first appeal was properly presented and that no second appeal lies. It is clear that under S. 7 (a) (iii), Civil P. C., a Court of Small Causes can have no power to execute decrees against immovable property. Its power to issue a warrant of arrest or to attach moveable properties is not affected by this subclause. The decree holder in this case, as he was desirous of getting the immovable property of the judgment-debtor attached, had the decree transferred to the Court of the District Munsif of Ellore.

By S. 42, Civil P. C, in consequence of the transfer, the decree, though passed by a Judge exercising Small Cause Court jurisdiction, becomes impressed with rights incident to a decree passed by the District Munsif. The words "as if it had been passed by itself" in the first sentence of the section show that the decree by force of its transmission acquires all the rights which a decree passed by the District Munsif exercising original jurisdiction would have for purposes of execution. The third sentence of S. 42 makes it clear that the orders in execution are subject to the same right of appeal as orders passed by the District Munsif exercising original jurisdiction. Mr. Somasundaram for the appellant suggested that the clause "shall be subject to the same rules in respect of appeal" only refers to the procedure to be adopted and does not confer a right of appeal.

This construction would make the sentence meaningless. I am clear that by virtue of the fact that the Munsif passed orders in execution in respect of a decree passed by the Small Cause Court, his orders became subject to appeal. The only difficulty which I find in giving full effect to this view relates to S. 104, Cl. (h), Civil P. C. That section enumerates the various orders which are appealable under the Code. Cl. (1) (h) says:

"An order under any of the provisions of this Code imposing a fine or directing the arrest or detention in the civil prison of any person except where such arrest or detention is in execution of a decree".

Reading it literally this clause would mean that no appeal is provided against an order in execution directing arrest or detention of a judgment-debtor. But I do not think that is the true construction of the clause. The exemption of order of arrest or detention in execution of a decree is due to the fact that such orders are covered by S. 47, Civil P. C. Under S. 2, Cl. (2) the expression "decree" includes the determination of any question within S. 47. Therefore inasmuch as the order exempted by Cl. (h) acquires the superior force of a decree, it was thought desirable by the legislature to exempt it in S. 104. Moreover Cl. (2), S. 104 provides that there shall not be a second appeal against the orders made appealable under Cl. (1). If the exemption in favour of arrest or detention in execution of a decree were not in Cl. (1) (h), it would follow that even where such orders are passed in execution of a decree of a regular Court for more than Rs. 500, no second appeal would lie from such an order. This would make S. 104 inconsistent with S. 47 and S. 2 (2). Therefore the object of exemption in S. 104, Cl. (1) (h), is not to make such orders unappealable, but only to point attention to the fact that they are not orders of the same class mentioned in the other subclauses. I am therefore of opinion that an appeal lies to the Sub-Court against the order of the District Munsif. This view is supported by a decision of this Court in Perumal v. Venkataraman (1). Although that case was decided with reference to the old Small Cause Courts Act, it seems to me that the conclusion is equally applicable to proceedings under Act 9 of 1887. In Peary Lal Singh v. Radha Nath Singh (2) the same view was taken.

If an appeal lies, then the question is whether a second appeal is competent. That must be answered in the negative, having regard to S. 102, Civil P. C. Under the old Code it was held in Lala Khandha Pershad v. Lala Lal Behary

(1) [1888] 11 Mad. 130.
(2) [1907] 11 C. W. N. 861.

Lal (3), Harakh v. Ram Surup (4) and cary Lal Singh v. Radha Nath Singh (2) that no second appeal lies in execution proceedings relating to Small Cause Court decrees. The language of S. 102 is an exact reproduction of S. 586 of the old Code: see also Mavula Ammal v. Mavula Maracair (5). For these reasons I am of opinion that the preliminary objection must be allowed and the appeal should be dismissed with costs. I agree as to the order passed by my learned brother in the civil revision petition.

Oldfield, J.—I agree with my learned brother's judgment; but I desire to add that the argument based on S. 42, Civil P. C., depends on the interpretation of the word "rules" therein as not conferring any substantive right of appeal, but referring only to the rules mentioned in Ss. 121—128. It is a sufficient answer to this that S. 42 merely reproduces S. 228 of the former Code, in which no such rules could have been in question. The appeal against order must be dismissed with costs. The civil revision petition, which is also before us, must be dismissed, because no question under S. 115, Civil P. C., is shown to arise. No order as to costs in the civil revision petition.

Second Appeal No. 979 of 1917, Decided on 2nd October 1918, against decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Salem, in Appeal Suit No. 216 of 1915, D/- 27th September 1916.

(a) Landlord and Tenant — Forfeiture—Kayam saswatham lease—Denial of title can forfeit lease—Denial of derivative title has same effect.

A kayam saswatham, or permanent tenancy, can be forfeited by denial of the landlord's title: 46 I. C. 62 and 24 Cal. 440, Foll. [P 268 C 1]

A denial of a derivative title will work a forfeiture as much as the denial of the original landlord's title: 46 I. C. 62, Foll. 18 W. R. 465, Diss from. [P 268 C 1]

If a tenant, honestly doubtful and not intending to identify himself with a third party who sets up a title in himself against the real landlord, merely puts his alleged derivative landlord to the proof of the latter's title before recognizing him as such, such conduct may not work a forfeiture of the tenancy and may not constitute such disclaimer of the title of the landlord as would work a forfeiture.

(b) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 111 (g)—Lease executed before Act—Separate act indicating intention to act on forfeiture is not pre-requisite to maintain ejectment suit.

In cases of leases executed before the Transfer of Property Act came into force or of agricultural leases, a separate act by the landlord indicating his intention to act upon a forfeiture that has been incurred is not a necessary pre-requisite for the maintainability of a suit in ejectment.

[P 268 C 2]

V. C. Seshachariar, A. Krishnaswami Aiyar and K. V. Sesha Aiyangar—for Appellant.

K. Srinivasa Aiyangar and B. Somaya —for Respondents.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The plaintiff is the appellant. He purchased the plaint village of Bojinaickampatti (or Posinaickenpatti) from Narasimhalu Naidu who acted on behalf of himself and his brother. They made the said sale as mittadars in 1901 under Ex. 3. Plaintiff had formerly brought a suit for rent against the defendants, who had obtained a kayam saswatham lease in 1839 from the original mittadars. That suit for rent was Original Suit No. 988 of 1904. In that suit, the defendants (the kayam saswatham lessees) denied that the plaintiff was the owner of the mitta and denied also the title of the plaintiff's vendors, Narasimhalu Naidu and his brother, to sell the property to the plaintiff. They set up the title of Venkatarama Naidu (the father of the plaintiff's vendors) who had parted with his rights in favour of his sons in 1897. The first Court decreed that suit of 1904 brought for rent, overruling the lessees' objections and establishing the title of the plaintiff as landlord. The lessees appealed, denying again in the appellate Court the plaintiff's title as landlord and continued such denial notwithstanding that Venkatarama Naidu (the father of the plaintiff's vendors, who had been made a party to the suit) mentioned in an application made to the appellate Court that he did not want any longer to contest the plaintiff's title in that particular suit, and his name was thereupon removed from the record on his expressing the intention of putting an end to the plaintiff's title afterwards by instituting a future suit for cancellation of the deed executed by him in favour of his sons.

The lessees failed in the appeal also and yet they preferred a second appeal again denying the plaintiff's title as landlord. On these facts, and also on the allegation that before filing of the present suit in ejectment (on the ground of forfeiture by denial of the landlord's title by the defendants) the plaintiff sent a notice to the defendants on 25th January 1908 requiring them to deliver up possession of the village, the plaintiff instituted the present suit for possession. The defendants set up that the plaintiff's two brothers not having joined him in the suit, the suit was bad for nonjoinder, that the plaintiff's purchase was bad for champerty and maintenance, that the defendants had a permanent lease right and that no notice of intention to take advantage of the alleged forfeiture was given in 1908 as alleged by the plaintiff. The District Munsif held on a construction of the kayam lease-deed (Ex. 1 of 1839) that it did confer a permanent heritable right on defendants' predecessor-in-title. He however decided that the defendants incurred forfeiture of that right of permanent tenancy by their denial of the plaintiff's title as their landlord not only in the written statement in the former suit in the first Court but also by their denials in the District Court and the High Court. He states in para. 10 of his judgment that "there was a clear and mala fide denial of plaintiff's title in the District Court and also in the High Court and that there was a forfeiture."

He further found that the plaintiff had given the notice, Ex. K, insisting on the forfeiture. The learned District Munsif was further of opinion that no notice to quit was necessary under the circumstances, because (I take it) the T. P. Act was not applicable to the rights and conditions of the lease, Ex. 1, created in 1839. As regards nonjoinder of plaintiff's brothers, one of them, as plaintiff's witness, denied that plaintiff's brothers had any right. This contention of defendants, though thus patently frivolous, was persisted in the appeal memorandum. On appeal the learned Subordinate Judge agreed with the District Munsif in holding that the kayam lease deed, Ex. 1, conferred a permanent heritable right. On the other question, viz. the question of forfeiture, however he held that, as the defendants did not attorn to the plaintiff after the purchase of the mitta village by the latter in 1901, the denial by the defendants of the plaintiff's title as landlord did not work a forfeiture. As regards the question whether their denial was bona fide or not, he does not give any definite finding except that the denial at the time of the written statement in the first Court in the former suit may not have been mala fide. The Subordinate Judge admits that the defendants made an unsuccessful attempt before the plaintiff's purchase to buy the property themselves from Narasimhalu Naidu and his brother and he also admits that the defendants "attempted to attack the plaintiff's right" as mittadar of this village in a suit instituted by them against the plaintiff and others. He observes

"that these two facts can never be said to be recognition of plaintiff's title."

So far as the first fact is concerned, it may not be a recognition of the plaintiff's title though it was clearly a recognition of plaintiff's vendor's title. As regards the second fact (see Ex. D which is an application by defendants for attachment of plaintiff's right as mittadar), I am wholly unable to understand the Subordinate Judge's observation that it is not a recognition of plaintiff's title. As regards the notice Ex. K, the Subordinate Judge does not give any finding as to whether it was sent by the plaintiff or not. He however found in para. 15 of his judgment that such a notice was not necessary if a forfeiture had been incurred.

In this second appeal, the questions which have been argued before us are (1) whether the lease deed, Ex. 1, conferred a permanent, heritable right or only a right during the lifetime of the grantee; (2) whether there have been several denials of the plaintiff's title during the course of the former suit of 1904; (3) whether any or all of those denials entailed a forfeiture of the tenancy; (4) whether any notice showing an intention to take advantage of the forfeiture was necessary, even after such denials, as a pre-requisite for the maintainability of this suit; and (5) whether the notice, Ex. K, was really given. So far as the first point is concerned, I do not think it is necesaary to give any final decision, though it should not be thought that I agree with the lower Courts in their construction of Ex. 1. If the matter were res judicata, I might probably have agreed with them. But having regard to the cases in Rajaram v. Narasinga (1) Venkataramana v. Venkatapatti Nayani Garu (2) and Foulkes v. Muthusami Goundan (3), I am not sure whether the question is not concluded by authority in favour of the restricted right of the grant as merely a grant for the lessee's lifetime. However, as I said, it is unnecessary to express any final opinion on that point for the decision of this case.

Assuming that Ex. 1 created a permanent heritable tenancy, it is clear that even such a tenancy can be forfeited by a denial of the landlord's title: see Rama Iyangar v. Anga Gurusami Chetti (4) and Kally Dass Ahiri v. Monmohini Dassee (5). It was argued for the respondents that a denial of a derivative title can in no circumstances work a forfeiture, and the case in Doorga Kripa Roy v. Sree Janoo Lathak (6) was replied upon. That case was quoted in Rama Iyangar v. Anga Gurusami Chetti (4), but was dissented from and I respectfully adopt the reasoning in the judgment in Rama Iyangar v. Anga Gurusami Chetti (4) on this point. So far as the question of denials in the former suit is concerned, there can be no hesitation on the perusal of the records of the former suit (Exs. A, B, C, 2, 4, 14) in holding that the lessees denied the plaintiff's title on different occasions, and in each of the Courts through which that litigation passed; and so far as the Courts of appeal are concerned, such denial could not have been bona fide. If a tenant honestly doubtful and not intending to identify himself with a third party who sets up a title in himself against the real landlord, merely puts his alleged derivative landlord to the proof of the latter's title before the tenant could recognize him as such, such conduct may not work a forfeiture of the tenancy and may not constitute such a disclaimer of the title of the landlord as would work a forfeiture. But it is impossible to hold, having regard to the defendants' conduct both in the former suit and in this suit, that the defendants did not intend to disclaim the plaintiff's title and their tenancy under the plaintiff, but merely in good faith wanted to have their doubts cleared whether the plaintiff was their legal landlord or whether anybody else was their legal landlord. The question whether there was a denial in appeal and in second appeal in the former litigation was not decided by the lower appellate Court in this case; but upon the admitted facts there can only be one conclusion, and that is that the denial by the defendants was deliberate and malicious and that they did not care whether Venkatarama Naidu still owned the landlord's title or not, their only object being to defeat the plaintiff by all means even after Venkatarama Naidu practically gave up his contest with the plaintiff.

Then the next question is whether a separate act by the plaintiff indicating his intention to act upon the forfeiture is a necessary pre-requisite for the maintainability of the suit. It is clear that the Transfer of Property Act does not apply to this lease, because the lease was created in 1839 long before the Transfer of Property Act was enacted. I am further of opinion that it is an agricultural lease and on that ground also the Transfer of Property Act does not apply. The same view has been held in Padmanabaya v. Ranga (7) and in Rama Iyangar v. Anga Gurusami Chetti (4) in respect of leases prior in date to the Transfer of Property Act. We are therefore thrown back upon the law as it existed before the Transfer of Property Act came into force. That law has been fully considered in the case in Rama Iyangar v. Anga Gurusami Chetti (4), and I agree with the conclusion arrived at therein that where there was a forfeiture by disclaimer of landlord's title, no separate preliminary act on the part of the landlord is necessary to enable him to maintain a suit in ejectment. The case in Venkatarama Bhatta v. Gunda Raya (8) quoted for the respondents has been explained in Padmanabaya v. Ranga (7), and that explanation seems to have been accepted in Rama Iyangar v. Anga Gurusami Chetti (4) also. ing, however, that notice is necessary, the Munsif found that the plaintiff did send the notice, Ex. K. The plaintiff has gone into the box and proved that he sent the notice and had it properly served through his Amin. Defendant 1's denial is worthless. I see no reason to disbelieve the plaintiff, and Ex. K, containing the usual endorsement by the person who served the notice that a copy was left with the person who received it. As the appellate Court has not dissented from the finding of the Munsif on this question, and has not given a finding of its own, I think we are entitled to find it ourselves. In the result I would reverse the decision of the lower appellate Court and restore that of the District Munsif except that the figure for damages, Rs. 1,000 mentioned in the Munsif's decree be altered into Rs. 750, at Rs. 250 a year in accordance with the finding of the lower appellate Court on that question. The respondents will pay the plaintiff's costs throughout.

Order of Reference

Ayling, J.—This is of the nature of a second appeal against an order of the District Munsif of Nadapuram directing restoration to respondents 1 to 8 of certain property, which he held to have been wrongly delivered to appellant under a decree of his Court. The sole question before us now is whether respondent's application was time barred; and this turns on whether Art. 165, Sch. 1, Lim. Act, is applicable to the case. Respondents were defendants in the original suit and judgment-debtors under the decree and we are asked by their counsel to hold that Art. 165 only applies to applications by other persons under O. 21, R. 100, and not to petitions by judgment-debtors under S. 47, Civil P. C. On this point there is a conflict of rulings. In Abdul Karim v. Islamunnissa Bibi (1) the learned Judges held in a carefully considered judgment that applications of this kind by judgment-debtors were governed by Art. 181, and not Art. 165. In this view I fully concur: as also in the reasoning which supports it. On the other hand a Bench of this Court has held in Ratnam Ayyar v. Krishna Doss Vital Doss (2) that Art. 165 applies: the judgment is in this respect of the briefest and assigns no reasons. With all respect I think this view is wrong; but as it has never been overruled and is reported in the regular series I do not feel justified in refusing to follow it without a reference to a Full Bench. I would therefore refer to a Full Bench the question of whether Art. 165, Sch. 1, Lim. Act, is applicable to applications by a judgment-debtor for restoration of immovable property in excess of what has been decreed.

Krishnan, J. — This appeal against appellate order arises from an application by respondents 1 to 8 against the appellant, under S. 47, Civil P. C., for recovering with mesne profits possession of certain properties alleged to have been wrongfully taken possession of by him in execution of the decree in Original Suit No. 762 of 1909 from their lessee respondent 9 who was defendant 15 in the case. Respondents 1 to 8 are the legal representatives of one Ahmed Kutti who was defendant 10 in the suit. They had first put forward their present claim as a suit Original Suit No. 392 of 1913, but on objection being taken by the appellant it was converted into an application under S. 47, as they are the representatives of defendant 10 in Original Suit No. 762 of 1909. Both the lower Courts have held that they are entitled to the relief claimed by them as the decree in Original Suit No. 762 of 1909 did not include the properties in question and have directed the properties to be redelivered to them with mesne profits at Rs. 20 a year. Appellant's plea that the respondents' application was time barred under Art. 165. Lim. Act. having been made nearly 2 years and 11 months after possession was taken by him was overruled the lower Courts holding that the 3 years' rule of limitation applied, apparently under Art. 181 though they do not say so expressly.

(1) [1916] 38 All. 339=34 I. C. 23.
(2) [1898] 21 Mad. 494=8 M L. J. 75.

The appellant has again raised before us the same question of limitation. His learned counsel contends that Art. 165 applies and relies upon the observation in the case in Ratnam Ayyar v. Krishna Doss Vital Doss (2), where the learned Judges say:

"There can be no doubt as held by the lower appellate Court that Art. 165, Sch. 2, Lim. Act, is applicable to a case where the applicant is a party bound by the decree as well as where he is a stranger: see Vythilinga Muppanar v. Seethalakshmi Ammal (3), Appeal Against Appellate Order No. 25 of 1889 (unreported)."

That observation is no doubt directly in the appellants' favour but the question was recently considered by the Allahabad High Court in Abdul Karim v. Islamunnisa Bibi (1) where the learned Judges held dissenting from the view taken in the Madras case, that Art. 165 did not apply to an application by a judgment-debtor for restoration of immovable property seized by the decree-holder in excess of what had been decreed but Art. 181 applied. With all respect to the learned Judges in the Madras cases I am inclined to think that the view expressed in the Allahabad case is correct and should be adopted. I fully agree with the reaaons given by the learned Judges in that case and I need not repeat them. I would however add that if Art. 165 should be read as applicable to an application like the present one under S. 47, it would be equally justifiable to apply it to a defendant who claims to recover by way of restitution proceedings immovable property taken by the decree-holder from him for he would also be a person dispossessed of immovable property applying under the Code of Civil Procedure, and disputing the right of the decree-holder to be put into possession. It has however always been held that Art. 181 is applicable to such a case. Furthermore as Art. 165 cannot by its terms apply to the recovery of movable property or of money taken by the decree-holder in excess of what he is entitled to under the decree the application of Art. 165 to the recovery of immoveable property so taken will lead to the extraodinary postion that in the case of the latter the judgment-debtor will only have 30 days, whereas in the case of the former he will have 3 years, a result that the legislature can hardly have intended. The wording of Art. 165 and its position in conjunction with Arts. 166 and 167 would seem to indicate that it is properly applicable only to applications under O. 21, R. 100, Civil P. C. I may also observe that when as in the present case a person dispossesses another of property not included in the decree it seems doubtful if the latter can be considered to be "a decree-holder" qua that property within the meaning of the article.

In Ratnam Ayyar v. Krishna Doss Vital Doss (2) there is no discussion of the question before us as the learned Judges merely follow the unreported case. It would also seem as pointed out in Abdul Karim v. Islamunnissa Bibi (1), that the observation in it is in reality an obiter dictum, as the Judges were dealing with the case of a minor to whom they held no limitation applied. On examining the unreported case in Appeal Against Appellate Order No. 25 of 1889 [Vythilinga Muppnaar v. Seethalaashmi Ammal (3)]. I find it is no doubt a decision in point. But the judgment in it is based entirely on the absence of the words "other than a judgement-debtor" in the article. This is no doubt at first sight an important point, but I am inclined to think that it does not affect the consideration in favour of the opposite view.

It is only if the article can be applied to the case of a judgment-debtor, that the omision will be material. But, if, as I think, the article applies only to applications under R. 100, it was unnecessary and even incorrect to introduce an exception in favour of jndgment-debtors into it when the rule is sufficient to exclude them as it does. The form of the article is thus quite consistent with my view. I therefore agree to the reference to the Full Bench proposed by my learned brother.

Opinion.

Wallis, C. J.—The period of limitation prescribed by Arts. 165 and 168 may be traced back to Ss. 230 and 269, Civil P. C. 1859, which dealt only with obstructions by, and dispossessions of, persons other than the defendant. The provision in S. 230 was re-enacted as Art. 158 (now 165), Lim. Act, 1871, as follows:

"Under the Code of Civil Procedure, by a person dispossessed of immovable property and disputing the right of the decree-holder to be put into possession."

This, in my opinion, must be read as meaning

"disputing the right of the decree-holder to be put into possession under the decree."

That question had been decided against the defendant in the suit itself, and it was not open to him to raise it again in execution. This shows that Art. 158 was intended to apply only to a case covered by S. 230 of the Code, where a person other than the defendant had been dispossessed, and that is in accordance with the ordinary presumption that no substantial alteration is intended when a particular provision is transferred from one Statute to another. Art. 158 of the Act of 1871 did not provide for applications by a decree-holder who had been resisted by third persons in taking possession under the decree, whereas Art. 160 (now 167) dealt with complaints in the case of Court sales both by the purchaser and by persons dispossessed by him (S. 269 of the Code of 1859). In the Act of 1877, Art. 158 was reproduced as Art. 165 and amended by inserting after decree-holder the words "or purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree," and Art. 167 was amended by extending it to complaints of obstruction by decree-holders as well as by purchasers (a case not dealt with by the Act of 1871), and by making it applicable to applications complaining of dispossession, not only by auction purchasers, but also by decree-holders. Both these cases were however covered by Art. 165 as amended, and the latter portion of this article was therefore not reproduced in Art. 167 of the Act of 1908. In Appeal Against Appellate Order No. 25 of 1889 [Vythilinga Muppanar v. Seethalakshmi Ammal (3), which was followed in Ratnam Ayyar v. Krishna Doss Vital Doss (2), the learned Judges relied on the fact that Arts. 165 and 167 do not in terms exclude the judgment-debtor, but their attention was not called to the fact that the articles were transferred from the Code of 1859 where the restriction was to be found. They further observed that:

"unless the articles referred severally to judgment-debtors as well as third parties, there would be tautology."

There was however tautology in the Act of 1877 in either view and in the Act of 1908, Art. 167 was amended so as to remove it. There is in my opinion nothing in these changes to show any intention of widening the scope of the article so as to make it applicable to defendants.

The decision in Ratnam Ayyar v. Krishna Doss Vital Doss (2) having stood so long unquestioned in this Court and elsewhere I have felt great doubt as to whether we should not continue to follow it, having regard to the nature of the points decided, on the principle of stare decisis. The legislature has however itself restricted the scope of Art. 165 by restricting in the Code of 1908 applications by third parties under O. 21, R. 100, to applications with reference to property covered by the decree or sale in pursuance thereof, and the fact that this procedure is not now applicable to complaints by third parties of dispossession of property not covered by such decree or sale appears to me to afford an additional reason for excluding from the scope of the article similar complaints by defendants who, as I am satisfied, were never intended to be covered by it. I think moreover that the rights of defendants are sufficiently restricted by their being required to apply under S. 47 within the period limited by Art. 181. Agreeing with the decision in Abdul Karim v. Islamunnissa Bibi (1) I would overrule Ratnam Ayyar v. Krishna Doss Vital Doss (2) and answer the question in the negative.

Ayling, J.—I agree.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—In this case, I shared with my Lord (if I may respectfully say so) the hesitation he felt in overruling the old decision in Ratnam Ayyar v. Krishna Doss Vital Doss (2). But I am convinced after regarding his opinion that that decision is erroneous. As cases of wrong delivery of judgment-debtors' property in excess of that decreed are rare and and as it is very unlikely that many titles could have been created arising from alienations of such property by decree-holders to purchasers who believed the title to have been perfected by the default of judgment-debtors to file their applications within the shorter period of limitation till now prevailing, and as most of even those titles would have been perfected by the lapse of three years since the dates of such alienations, I agree in the answer proposed by my Lord.

Second Appeal No. 501 of 1918, Decided on 10th January 1919, against decree of Sub-Judge, South Malabar, in Appeal Suits Nos. 88 and 61 of 1917.

(a) Transfer of Property Act (1382), Ss. 76 (1) and 83—S. 76 (1) does not apply to money due to mortgagee for improvements in Malabar because it is not money due on mortgage within S. 83.

Section 76 (i) has no application to money due for improvements to a mortgagee in Malabar, because the value of improvements effected by such mortgagee cannot be brought under the expression "amount due on the mortgage" in S. 83 of the Act. [P 272 C 2]

(b) Malabar Law—Mortgage — Mortgagee entitled to possession till satisfaction or ejectment in decree—He is not liable for mesne profits till either happens.

A mortgagee in Malabar has a right to remain in possession till he is actually paid or till he is ejected by decree of Court and hence he is not accountable for mesne profits till either of those events happens: 43 I.C. 173, Foll. [P 272 C 2]

(c) Malabar Compensation for Tenants Improvements Act (1 of 1908), S. 5—S. 5 applies to all tenants except such as have been paid—Policy of the Act stated—Compensation is to be determimed by Court—Right cannot be taken away by tender of sufficient amount.

Per Napier, J.—S. 5, Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act applies to all tenants except such as have been paid. If payment has been made and the term is determined or the mortgage has been discharged, the section has no application. If the "compensation is so due," i. e., has not been paid, then the section applies.

According to the policy of the Act, the compensation is to be ascertained by the Court. If a tenant accepts payment he waives his right, but if he claims assessment by the Court, there is nothing to deprive him of his statutory right under S. 5, even if the amount tendered is found to be sufficient. Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The contentions as to defendant 1's (appellant mortgagee's) right to additional compensation for improvements (that is, in addition to what has been awarded to him by the lower Court) raise questions of fact which we cannot entertain in second appeal.

The Subordinate Judge however was wholly unjustified in assuming that the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act were not in the minds of the Benches of this Court which decided Chami v. Ana Pattar (1) and Parmeswara Ayyan v. Kittunni Valia Mannadiar (2) and in awarding mesne profits to plaintiff after the date of the tender made in Court by the respondents under S. 83, Act 4 of 1882. Seshagiri Aiyar, J., does refer to S. 83 of that Act in his judgment in the former case. S. 76 (i) refers to S. 83 by using the words "in manner hereinafter provided" and the language of the two sections (one speaking of "the amount for the time being due on the mortgage" and the other "the amount remaining due on the mortgage") is very similar when referring to the mortgagee's right to be paid his money before redemption.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J., clearly says in Chami v. Ana Pattar (1) that he agreed with the appellant's vakil in that case "that the value of improvements cannot be brought under the expression "amount due on the mortgage" in S. 83, T. P. Act."

It follows that S. 76, Cl. (i), also has no application to the money due for improvements to a Malabar mortgagee.

Nothing that has been advanced by the respondent's learned vakil in the arguments in this case has tended to throw any doubt on the opinion I expressed in Parameswara Ayyan v. Kittunni Valia Mannadiar (2) that the mortgagee in Malabar has a right to remain in possession till he is actually paid or till he is ejected by decree of Court, and hence that he is not accountable for mesne profits till either of these events happens. The legislature cannot have intended to make a mortgagee tenant liable for mesne profits on tender, but not a lessee tenant, which would be the result if the respondent's contention is accepted, S. 5, Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act, making no difference between a mortgagee tenant and a tenant holding on a mere verumpattam or on a mere Kuzhikanom right.

(1) [1916] 32 I. C. 861.
(2) [1918] 43 I. C. 173.

The lower Court's decrees will therefore be modified by striking out of the first Court's decree the words beginning with "and future mesne profits" and ending with "from this date."

The parties will bear their respective costs in this second appeal.

Napier, J.—I agree with the decision in Parameswara Ayyan v. Kittunni Valia Mannadiar (2). The matter seems to me to be concluded by the language of S. 5, Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act. That section seems to apply to all tenants except such as have been paid. If payment has been made and the term is determined or the mortgage has been discharged, the section has no application. If the compensation is so due that is, has not been paid, then the section applies. The legislature could have added the words "or a proper sum tendered", but has not thought fit to do so, although in the same section it speaks of payment or tender of the mortgage money. We are asked to import S. 76 (i), T. P. Act. I agree with Seshagiri Aiyar, J., in Chami v. Ana Pattar (1) that this does not apply and I further think that if it was to be applied, it would introduce a special rule in cases of mortgages while another rule based on the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act remained for leases, which constitute a number of cases in which compensation has to be paid. I am unable to follow Seshagiri Aiyar J.'s reasoning at the end of his judgment in Chami v. Ana Pattar (1), as I do not understand his reference to Cl. 2, S. 5, Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act. The Act may operate against the landlord in some cases, but that can be dealt with in Court. It must also be borne in mind that according to the policy of the Act the compensation is to be ascertained by the Court: vide S. 19 of the Act. If a tenant accepts payment he waives his right, but if he claims assessment by the Court, I can see nothing in the Act which deprives him of his statutory right under S. 5 of the Act even if the amount tendered is found to be sufficient.

Judgment.—The question in this case is whether O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C., bars the present suit. The plaintiff obtained a sale of certain property. Subsequently the right of the vendor for uncollected rent was assigned to him. The plaintiff first sued for arrears of rent due under his assignment. The second suit is for the rent based on title. In our opinion the causes of action for the two suits are not the same. It is true that under O. 2, R. 3, Civil P. C., the plaintiff could have joined both the causes of action in one suit. But that is not the test. As was pointed out in Dasarthy Naidu v. Palala Kumaramull (1), the test is not whether the plaintiff could have sued for both the claims in the same suit, but whether he was bound to have sued. Mr. K. S. Jayarama Aiyar contended that the only obligation was to pay rent and that all the breaches of that obligation form but one cause of action. In the present case, the obligations are different. The one was incurred to the assignor and he could have sued separately notwithstanding the fact that he subsequently sold the property in respect of which rent had accrued due. The obligation in the second suit relates to the right arising from the title to property itself. As was pointed out in Naro Hari v. Anpurnabai (2) printed as foot-note in Vishnu Sakharam Nagarakar v. Krishnarao Malhar (3) and in the cases following it, it is not the final breach that constitutes the cause of action but the right and the infringement taken together. In this view, the two suits were based on two different causes of action. The case is practically on all fours with Muhammad Abdul Aziz v. Rafiunnissa Bibi (4) and we are of opinion that that case enunciates the true principle applicable to such cases. In Ittappan v. Manavikrama (5) this Court's definition of the term "cause of action" accords with the view taken in Allahabad.

For these reasons, we must reverse the decree of the District Judge and restore that of the District Munsif with this modification, that plaintiff should be given interest at one per cent per mensem on Rs. 87-8-0 from 1st March 1913 up to date of suit and on the other Rs. 87-8-0 from 1st March 1914 to date of suit, and thereafter at 6 per cent per annum till date of realization. Parties will pay and receive proportionate costs here and in the Courts below.

Malabar Law—Stanom — Party alleging that alienation by stanee is binding on his successor must prove that it is for benefit of estate.

The party who alleges that an alienation by a stanee is valid beyond the lifetime of the grantor that is, that it is binding on his successor, ought to prove that the alienation was for the benefit of the estate, or in other words that it was such as would be binding on the members of a joint Hindu family if made by a manager of the family other than the father. Judgment.—The party who alleges that an alienation by a stanee is valid beyond the lifetime of the grantor, that is, that it is binding on his successor, ought to prove that the alienation was for the benefit of the estate, or (to put it in a different way) was such as would be binding on the other members of a joint Hindu family if made by a manager of the family (who was not also the father of the other members). The defendant in this case did not take any steps to discharge the burden of proof and the disputed alienation was a lease for 72 years by an old gentleman almost on his death-bed in favour of a near relative. We therefore hold that the lower Court rightly decided that the alienation was not binding on the successor of the grantor. The Letters Patent appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Plaintiffs sued to set aside different alienations made by a Hindu widow of whom they claimed to be the reversioners and to recover possession of the property from the different alienees. The Court of first instance decreed the suit in favour of the plaintiffs. The defendants-alienees preferred separate appeals to the High Court which drew up only one decree under R. 105, Civil Rules of Practice. On an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council against the decision of the High Court in each of the appeals:

Order.—In this case the plaintiffs sued as next reversioners on the death of the widow of the alleged last male holder and joined various defendants who were in possession of properties which they alleged formed part of the estate of the last maleowner. There were really different causes of action against the defendants, but they were allowed, according to a well-established practice, to be joined in the same suit. The Subordinate Judge passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs against the alienees of the several items of property. These alienees and the other defendants filed separate appeals in the High Court and the appeals of some of the defendants-alienees were allowed on the ground that the items in question were not shown to have formed part of the estate of last male owner. Although several separate appeals were filed, in accordance with R. 105, of the Civil Rules of Practice, only one appellate decree was drawn up. Some of the appeals of the defendants-alienee which were allowed by us relate to items of property which are said to be of less value than Rs. 10,000 and it is objected by these defendants as respondents to the petitions that in these circumstances, the petitioners are not entitled to a certificate under S. 110, Civil P. C., We think that the fact that only one appellate decree was drawn up in all these appeals cannot affect the rights either of the appellants or the respondents in those appeals with reference to a further appeal to His Majesty in Council and that the applications must be considered as if a separate decree had been passed in each appeal. Otherwise, the effect of the Civil Rules of Practice would be to interfere with the right of appeal or the right to retain the judgment of this Court without appeal both very valuable substantive rights as has often been pointed out. This is a matter with which we have no power to interfere by means of the Civil Rules of Practice. [The rest of the judgment is immaterial for the purpose of this report. Ed.]

Second Appeal No. 390 of 1917, Decided on 16th December 1918, against the decree of Sub-Judge, Coimbatore, in Appeal No. 85 of 1916.

 Hindu Law—Partition—Suit for partition by minor—Decree can be passed only if minor's interest are likely to be advanced thereby or likely to be protected.

In a suit for partition by a Hindu minor, the Court should not pass a decree for partition unless the minor's interests are likely to be advanced thereby or protected from danger. [P 278 C 1]

The mere possibility of future births in the family is not a good ground for partition, nor is the fact that the minor's father has married a second wife and the minor's mother is in consequence living away from her husband. [P 278 C 1]

To entitle a minor to claim partition on the ground of malversation of the properties by the father, actual malversation need not be proved, it is sufficient if the interests of the minor in the joint family property are in danger: 4 Bom. L. R. 883, Expl. [P 278 C 1]

L. A. Govindaragava Aiyar—for Appellants.

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar and T. M. Krishnaswami Aiyar—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—This second appeal arises out of a suit for partition instituted by two minors through their maternal grandfather as the next friend. Defendant 1, who is the main respondent in the appeal, is the father of the plaintiffs. The only question for consideration is whether upon the facts proved and found, the lower appellate Court was justified in refusing to pass a decree for partition. It is settled law that a Court is not bound to grant a decree for partition of joint family property as a matter of course in a suit instituted on behalf of minors: see Chelimi Chetty v. Subbanna (1), following Bachoo v. Mankorebai (2), and Kamakshi Ammal v. Chidambara Reddi (3). So far the law is not disputed, but there has been much discussion as to the nature of the grounds which would justify the Court in decreeing partition at the instance of a minor. The facts found by the lower appellate Court are: defendant 1, the father of the minors—who are only 6 and 4 years of age—has married a second wife; there had been estrangement between him and the mother of the minors and the latter has gone away to her father's house and is unwilling to come back to defendant 1. The Subordinate Judge characterises her allegations against defendant 1, as to ill-treatment and immorality as a myth and holds that the plaintiffs have not made out that defendant 1 refused to maintain the plaintiffs or their mother or that he had in any way neglected them. He finds that some old family debts have been discharged though apparently with money found by defendant 1's mother during his minority. It is admitted however that defendant 1, has sold a house belonging to the family, but the Subordinate Judge has refrained from considering whether the sale was for necessity or not, though the Court of trial was disposed to regard it as an act of malfeasance. Upon the facts the conclusion of the Subordinate Judge is as stated in his words:

"I can find no circumstances to suggest that the minor's interest is likely to suffer if the property is allowed to continue in the hands of defendant 1. . . .", but he thought that this was a proper case in which he shall obtain a written undertaking from defendant 1, not to alienate the family property during the minority of the minor plaintiffs and that if any necessity arises in the future for making an alienation he will apply for permission of the Court for that purpose. The District Munsif in decreeing the suit was under the impression that a suit for partition by a minor member of a joint family stood on the same footing as a suit by an adult co-parcener. In this he was undoubtedly wrong: in the former case the Court, as laid down in the rulings above mentioned, has a discretion, that is to say it will not decree partition unless it finds that it will be for the benefit of the minor that there should be a partition while where a major co-parcener seeks partition the Court has no option but to pass a decree to that effect. On the merits the District Munsif based his judgment in favour of the plaintiffs mainly on the ground that defendant 1, who is only 24, is likely to have sons born to him by his second wife which will necessarily diminish the plaintiffs' share in the family property and therefore a partition would be decidedly beneficial to the minors. The Subordinate Judge, in my opinion is right in holding that this is not sufficient and valid consideration and that there is much cogency in his argument that if it were otherwise directly a son is born it would lie with anyone who so chooses to break up the family by instituting a suit for partition as next friend of the minor. Mr. Govindaraghava Iyer who argued the case for the appellants has not been able to cite any sort of authority in support of his proposition.

The joint family tenure of property is the normal condition of the Hindu social system and the Court should not take the responsibility of depriving a Hindu minor co-parcener of the advantages of that system unless it is satisfied that in the circumstances of the particular case it would be clearly to his benefit that he should be separated from the joint family. It is an incident of the joint family system that the share of a Hindu co-parcener in the family property is liable to diminution by accession of new members by births; on the other hand, he enjoys the chance of having his share augmented by deaths. It seems to me that it is not for the Court to speculate how far the one chance counterbalances the other.

As for the decided cases the Court has decreed partition in suits on behalf of a minor where the actual existing circumstances of the family made it manifest that a partition would be for the benefit of the minor and not merely on remote hypothetical grounds. In Kamakshi Ammal v. Chidambara Reddi (3), which is the earliest decision in this Presidency on the subject that has been brought to our notice, defendant 1 had denied the plaintiff's adoption and set up a will by the adoptive father of the infant which conferred on the defendant an exclusive title to the whole estate. Innes and Collett, JJ., held that in such a case partition should be granted. Both the learned Judges were of opinion that it was not necessary that there should be actual malversation of the property of the co-parcener as was the opinion of the lower Court and in the language of Innes, J.,

"an action will not indeed lie, unless there is something clearly indicating that the interests of the infant will be advanced by a partition because ordinarily speaking the family estate is better managed and yields a greater ratio of profit in union than when split up and distributed among several parceners, and as a general rule therefore it is more profitable for an infant parcener that his share should continue an integral portion of the whole estate in the hands of kinsmen."

Collett, J.'s judgment is to the same effect, and it will be sufficient to quote only the general proposition laid down by him, viz., that

"generally so great a change in the condition of a minor as a partition operates ought not to be allowed to take place unless it is clearly for his benefit that it should be so."

In Thangam Pillai v. Suppa Pillai (4) the co-parceners had persistently denied that the minor plaintiff was their brother and it was held by Muthuswami Aiyar and Wilkinson, JJ., that this fact showed that the minor's interest in the joint family property would be in danger if left under the management of the appellants and that justified a decree for partition. The case in Chelimi Chetty v. Subbanna (1) has already been noticed where Oldfield, J., and myself accepted the proposition that in a suit for partition on behalf of a minor the Court will not grant a decree unless it is satisfied that it will be for his benefit. In this we followed the judgment of the Privy Council in Bachoo v. Mankorebai (2), which affirmed the decision of Tyabji, J., in Bachoo v. Khushaldas (5). The present question it may be mentioned, was but incidentally under consideration in Chelimi Chetty v. Subbanna (1), the point for decisions there being whether the institution of a suit on behalf of a minor ipso facto created a separation. In Bachoo v. Khushaldas (5) and Bachoo v. Mankorebai (2) it was found that a partition, when it was asked for, would not be beneficial to the minor plaintiff as division of the properties could not be effected without selling certain valuable properties and their sale at that stage would result in considerable loss. The proposition that was accepted by Tyabji, J., was that

"some malversation, danger or loss to the minor on the one hand or some benefit or advantage on the other must be proved before the Court can compel partition, for all the co-parceners are minors."

It does not appear to me that any exception can be taken to this proposition considering it in the light of the facts which gave rise to it. In Mahadev Balvant v. Lakshman Balvant (6), partition on behalf of a minor was allowed, the allegation in the plaint of disputes between the minor plaintiffs' mother and their stepbrother, separate residence of the former and the defendant's failure to support the plaintiffs being found sufficient to maintain the suit. Ranade, J., in the course of his judgment lays down that the Court has to see whether a partition would promote the interest of the minor plaintiffs in the circumstances as found by him. It seems to me that this is the test which is countenanced by all the authorities Kumaraswami Sastri, J., in Shadagopa Naidu v. Thirumalaswami Naidu (7) sitting singly held that where a father sets up a hostile title and denies the right of his minor son to any share in the joint family properties and the father has been living apart from his wife with a concubine, it is the duty of the Court to order partition in a suit on behalf of the minor.

He quotes with approval the proposition of Ranade, J., in Mahadev Balvant v. Lakshman Balvant (6) that no suit by a minor co-parcener for partition should be decreed unless his interests were likely to be advanced thereby or protected from danger. As regards the second condition, no exception could be taken to it and as regards the first I do not think that either Ranade, J., or Kumaraswami Sastri, J., intended to countenance any speculative considerations such as the possible birth of other coparceners as a ground for partition. In Bhola Nath v. Ghasi Ram (8) it is laid down by Stanley, C. J., that the Court has to determine on the entire circumstances of the case whether it would be for the benefit of the minor that a partition of a joint family property should be effected. In my opinion this proposition is entirely in accord with the other authorities already noticed. It will serve no useful purpose to attempt to define any further the circumstances in which partition should be granted or refused at the instance of the minor. All that is necessary in this case to lay down, having regard to the arguments addressed to us, is that a mere possibility of births of other coparceners in the family is not a good ground for partition. It is not necessary that actual malversation should be proved; it is sufficient if the interests of the minor in the joint family property are in danger. All the circumstances have to be taken into consideration in determining whether it would be for the benefit of the minor that his share should be set apart and secured for him.

We have here the fact that plaintiff's father, though a young man, has married another wife and that there have been quarrels between plaintiffs' mother and their father, with the result that they have been living separately. It is almost admitted that a house belonging to the family has been sold by the father. If the sale of the house was without necessity, that would be a strong circumstance to be considered along with other facts in connexion with the question whether there should not be a partition. The lower appellate Court, in my opinion, was not justified in holding that the sale of the house, even if made without necessity, would not affect the question whether there should be a partition. It is now contended before us by the respondents that the sale took place before the birth of the plaintiffs. I would therefore ask the Subordinate Judge to find whether the sale of the house took place before the birth of the plaintiffs, and if not, whether the sale was justified by necessity, whether a proper price was obtained and what happened to the sale proceeds and the total value and income of the family properties. He will allow the parties to adduce fresh evidence on this point. The time for the return of the finding will be two months from the date of the receipt of the records and ten days for objections.

Napier, J.—This is a suit for partition against a father brought by his minor sons through their next friend, their maternal grandfather. The lower appellate Court has found that no case has been made out which would entitle the Court to decree a partition. Mr. Govindaraghava Aiyar has argued before us, first, that where it can be shown that there is a probability that the minor's financial position will in future be better if he has been divided from his father, the minor is entitled to a partition, and secondly, that if that proposition is too broad, on the facts found, he should be given a decree. He has contended that the sole question is, whether partition can in any way benefit the minor and he relies on the use of the word "benefit" in certain reported cases, in support of his contention. The latest case is that reported as Chelimi Chetty v. Subbanna (1) and the language is as follows:

"The Court has to consider in such cases whether a decree for partition would be for the benefit of the minor."

My learned brother who was a party to that decision states that he did not intend to lay down that the probability of monetary advantage was the sole test, and, if I may say so, this is clear from the fact that the Court relied on the decision reported as Kamakshi Ammal v. Chidambara Reddi (3), the earliest case on the subject. Mr. Govindaraghava Iyer has claimed however that that case also supports his proposition. It was one in which a suit was brought on behalf of an infant against a co-parcener not his father for partition. The lower Court had declined to grant it, as it was not alleged by the plaintiff that the infant's interests were in danger through malversation. On appeal, it was argued that it was not necessary to prove malversation. Innes, J., begins his judgment as follows:

"The true rule seems to be that a suit on behalf of a minor for partition will lie if the interests of the minor are likely to be prejudiced by the property being left in the hands of the co-parceners from whom it is sought to recover it."

I lay special stress on the use of the words "true rule," because it seems to me that any passage in the judgment which might appear to state a wider proposition must be read in a limited sense, so as to bring it into accord with the statement. He then goes on to say that there is no foundation for the position that an infant can only claim partition when there is malversation, and in this connexion he continues:

"An action will not indeed lie, unless there is something clearly indicating that the interests of the infant will be advanced by partition."

Then with reference to the facts of the case, he points out that the co-parcener has set up a sole title to the property, and thereby assumed a position adverse to the interests of the infant, by bringing forward a will which, if genuine, would be inconsistent with the existence of any rights in the infant; and he therefore concludes that the interests of the infant would not be safe in the co-parcener's hand. Collett, J., agrees that it is not necessary to prove malversation. He says that the plaint does set out facts which, if true, go to show that the minor's interests might be exposed to risk if the suit were not now brought; and quotes Strange's Hindu Law, p. 206, as authority for the proposition that waste by the co-parcener is not the sole occasion, but is only an instance that it may be for the benefit of a minor that a suit should be brought for partition. In that connexion, he says

"so that, as we might expect, the benefit of the minor is what justifies such a suit."

He then refers to the texts and commentary quoted in 3 Digest, p. 544, and says that the rule is "that a partition during the minority of a co-parcener cannot take place to the damage of his interests, but the motive is the protection of his interests, and consequently if it is in fact, as it may very well be, greatly for his benefit and for the protection of his interest that there should be a partition, a suit on his behalf may be brought."

Then comes a passage which is, I think, very important:

"It is obvious that it often may not be for the benefit of a minor that he should have a partition. If his rights are not denied or the property not mismanaged, it might not be so, he would lose for instance, the possible benefit of a survivorship, and generally so great a chance in the condition of a minor as a partition operates, ought not to be allowed to take place, unless it is clearly for his benefit that it should be so."

I read these cases as laying down three propositions, first, that presumably it is for the benefit of a minor that he should remain a member of a family whose interest is to look after him, and secondly, that a possible financial position is not the test, and thirdly, that he has no right to claim partition unless there is an apprehended danger to his interest as it exists at the date of the suit. I cannot detach the use of the words "benefit of the minor" from the rule laid down by Innes J., at the beginning of his judgment that a suit will lie if the interests of the minor are likely to be prejudiced. Reliance is also placed on a passage in a case reported as Bhola Nath v. Ghasi Ram (8) which is as follows:

"The question for the Court to determine is whether or not it is shown to be for benefit of the minor that partition of the joint family property should be effected."

This language however must be read with the facts of the case and the other observations. The suit was by a minor for partition of his share in a joint family consisting of himself, his father and his uncle. He alleged that his father had admitted to a share in the property the son of a deceased uncle, who, according to the plaintiff, had separated from the rest of the family long before the date of the suit. The first Court dismissed the suit on the ground that there was no evidence of malversation. The High Court pointed out that that was not necessary: that the allegations, if proved, show that the family was endeavouring to deprive the plaintiff of a part of his lawful interest in the family property. The Court then used the following words:

"The Subordinate Judge has overlooked the fact that there are circumstances other than malversation which, according to the authorities, will justify the institution of a partition suit. These are such circumstances as in the interest of the minor render it advisable that his share should be set aside and secured for him."

Undoubtedly if those facts were proved it would be necessary even against the father in that case that the minor's share should be secured to him at once, and in my opinion, the case is no authority for any broader proposition than this. Then there is a decision of Tyabji, J., in Bachoo v. Khushaldas (5). That was a suit by a minor against his uncle and an alleged adopted son of the uncle. The learned Judge, in considering whether he should be given partition, states that some malversation, danger or loss to the minor on the one hand, or some benefit or advantage on the other hand, must be proved before the Court will compel partition. He then examines the condition of the estate; and comes to the conclusion that there would possibly be heavy monetary sacrifices in realizing the estate, and adds that if the plaintiff were separate, he would entirely lose his chance of gaining the whole estate by survivorship, if the alleged son died before him. It is suggested that the language of the learned Judge indicates that malversation, danger or loss need not be proved, If some benefit or advantage can be proved (vide the language on p. 888) and that in this case it must be to the benefit of a minor to be separate from a father who has married a second wife and will possibly have other children.

If this is what the learned Judge meant it goes beyond the principle stated in Kamakshi Ammal v. Chidambara Reddi (3) and I am not prepared to follow it. Rather to the same effect is the decision in Mahadev Balvant v. Lakshman Balvant (6). Speaking for myself, I find some difficulty in understanding what Ranade, J., meant in this latter case by his distinction between the positive and negative aspect of the case, but if he means that even where nothing is shown against the father, it can yet be for the benefit of the minor to be removed from the family, I am unable to follow him. A recent decision of this Court is that of a single Judge reported as Shadagopa Naidu v. Thirumalaswami Naidu (7). There the learned Judge states as follows:

"It is now settled law that a minor plaintiff can file a suit for partition if there are circumstances which show that it would be for his interest to separate his share, and it is not necessary to prove malversation on the part of adult members."

He refers to Ranade, J's discussion of the subject in Mahadev Balvant v. Lakshman Balvant (6) with approval. That case however was one in which it was found that partition was necessary to protect the minors' interest from danger; and the learned Judge states as follows:

"The defendant has set up a hostile title and has denied the rights of the minor plaintiff to any share of the properties, and while this is found against, it is the duty of the Court to safeguard the interest of the minors by declaring their rights and giving effect to such a declaration."

He then refers to the case reported as Kamakshi Ammal v. Chidambara Reddi (3) with approval and to Thangam Pillai v. Suppa Pillai (4). I have pointed out what in my opinion is the law laid down in Kamakshi Ammal v. Chidambara Reddi (3). As to Thangam Pillai v. Suppa Pillai (4) that was a case in which an illegitimate son of a Sudra sought a partition of the family property against his father's legitimate sons. The legitimate sons denied that he was their illegitimate brother, contending that his mother was a married woman. The Court having found in favour of the illegitimate son on the facts, held in the circumstances it could not be said that the plaintiff's interest in the joint family property was not in danger in being left in the management of the defendants. I do not think therefore that Kumaraswami Sastri, J., intended to lay down any proposition wider than that in Kamakshi Ammal v. Chidambara Reddi (3). If the language of Tyabji, J., and Ranade, J., in the Bombay cases does intend to give a wider meaning to the rule, their view is not in accordance with that taken in this Court, and I should not be prepared to accept it. The proposition as stated in Mayne's Hindu Law, Edn. 8, p. 662, is as follows:

"A suit cannot be brought by or on behalf of a minor to enforce partition, unless on the ground of malversation or some other circumstances, which make it for his interest that his share should be set aside and secured for him. Otherwise he might be thrust out of the family at the very time when he was least able to protect himself."

This proposition is in my opinion in entire accord with the law as laid down in Kamakshi Ammal v. Chidambara Reddi (3) and does not warrant the contention put forward for the appellants. The next question is whether on the facts the case is brought within this limited rule. The lower appellate Court finds that the plaintiffs' mother went to her father's house for confinement and did not return in spite of her husband's entreaties, and that in consequence he married a second wife about a year after this occurrence. He points out that the marriage of the second wife is not opposed to law and considers that such a marriage cannot be made a ground for partition, unless it was done with a view to act prejudicially to the interest of the children by his first wife. He then finds all the allegations against defendant 1, of waste of the property, extravagance. drinking and concubinage to be false and states that there is but one piece of evidence against the father, namely, that he alienated a house. We are now told in this Court that the alienation was before the birth of the children. We cannot of course take that as a fact but I should, speaking for myself, rather be inclined to accept the finding of the lower appellate Court that the plaintiffs have not shown that this alienation was made against the interests of the minors. As however my learned brother is of opinion that we should have a finding as to the circumstances in which the house was sold, I agree with the order proposed by him.

[In pursuance of the order contained in the above judgments, the Subordinate Judge submitted the following:]

Findings.—In pursuance of the order of the High Court directing this Court to take evidence and to submit findings on the following issues the following findings are submitted. The issues are:
(i) Whether the sale of the plaint house took place before the birth of the plaintiffs; and if not whether the sale was justified by necessity; whether proper price was obtained; and what happened to the sale proceeds.
(ii) What were the total value and income of the family properties?

The first part of issue 1.—The sale deed in question is dated 25th June 1907. The sale deed is Ex. 10. The plaintiffs' case is that plaintiff 1 was born or at least was in the womb of his mother on that date. The defendant's case is that plaintiff 1 was born on 11th March 1909, i.e. subsequent to the sale deed in question. It is admitted on the plaintiffs' side that plaintiff 2 was born subsequent to the date of the sale deed, the difference in age between plaintiffs 1 and 2 being admittedly two years. In the plaint filed in the suit on 4th November 1914 the age of plaintiff 1 is given as about 6 and that of plaintiff 2 as about 4, and that of their mother, defendant 2, is given as 22. These ages are given by the plaintiffs' maternal grandfather and next friend. Defendant 2, when examined by this Court on 25th November 1916, i.e., about four years after the date of the plaint, deposes that her age at that time was 26 and that the plaintiffs were five years and three years old respectively when she left her husband's house three years prior to that date. It appears from the plaint that she left her husband's house about seven or eight months before the date of the plaint.

If appears from Ex. D that defendant 1 also admits her having gone away one year before that date, 26th March 1915, i. e., about March 1914. It is seen therefore that plaintiff 1 was aged about 5 in March 1914, that is, he must have been born in the year 1909. Taking the age given in the plaint as 6 for plaintiff 1 at the time of the plaint (4th November 1914), plaintiff 1 must have been born in 1908 or 1909. Then the defendants produced an extract (Ex. 3) from the birth register of Rakkiapalayam where the plaintiffs were admittedly born, and the original birth register for the year 1909 is marked as Ex. 14. It appears from Exs. 13 and 14 that a son was born to Kasia Gounden of Avanasilingampalayam on 11th March 1909. Plaintiffs' next friend examined as P. W.1 admits that he is the monigar's gumastah for Rakkiapalayam; that he was writing the birth register for all these 17 years and submitted them to the taluk office; and also that he wrote entries relating to the birth of the two plaintiffs in the birth registers. The defendants' case is that this relates to the birth of plaintiff 1. But the suggestion on the plaintiffs' side is that it probably relates to plaintiff 2. It may be noted that the plaintiffs' next friend has not even attempted to get an extract from the birth register to prove the date of the birth of plaintiff 1 or of plaintiff 2, though he must be expected to know that that is the best evidence available. The defendants took out summonses for the production of the birth register from 1906 to 1910, but the Tahsildar has sent only the register of 1909 (Ex. 14) and has sent a letter (Ex. 15) to the effect that he is searching for the other registers. So, these Exs. 14 and 15 support the defendants' case that plaintiff 1 was not born on the date of the sale deed, Ex. 10, unless this extract relates to plaintiff 2. Seeing that the defendants have not produced the extract from the birth register with regard to the other plaintiff, I am inclined to hold that this relates to plaintiff 1.

It is argued for the plaintiffs that defendant 1 at one place of his deposition now taken in this Court, states that his second marriage was four years ago; that his first marriage was ten years prior to that: that plaintiff 1 was born two years after the marriage and that this takes us to the year 1906 as the year of plaintiff 1's birth. Then again it is argued that defendant 1 has stated in 1916 that he was married ten years prior to that (p. 7, printed papers, line 15) and that plaintiff 1 must therefore have been born sometime about March 1908 and he must have been conceived about June 1907. Defendant 1 states in Ex. D, his plaint, dated 27th March 1915, that he had been married to defendant 2 about nine years before that. If it be remembered that these periods of time are given only approximately, no such definite inference can be drawn as suggested by the plaintiffs' pleader. Then the plaintiffs' pleader relies upon the medical certificate given by the Assistant Surgeon of this place. It is marked as Ex. C. Therein, the medical officer examined as P. W. 4 states that the boy (plaintiff 1) has completed 11 years according to his opinion. In his evidence also he gives the same opinion. The grounds upon which he has given his opinion are: (i) permanent canines are present, (ii) anterior premolars or bicuspids are present.

It may be stated at once that the opinion of experts cannot be taken to be absolutely accurate, as has been observed in Taylor's Medical Jurisprudence, p. 143 ; Boisogomoff v. Nahapiet Jute Company (9), Basrur Venkata Row, In re (10) and Jarat Kumari Dassi v. Bissessur Dutt (11). Then coming to the reasons given in the certificate, it appears that they are not sound. No doubt, it appears from the medical books that permanent canines make their appearance between the ages of 10 and 13 and permanent anterior premolars or bicuspids make their appearance between the 9th and 10th years : vide Lyon and Waddle's Medical Jurisprudence, p. 40, and Taylor's Medical Jurisprudence, p. 144. In India, there is a chance of these teeth even cutting earlier. If the grounds given by the expert witness be correct, his inference that the boy must be aged between 10 and 13, will also be taken to be correct. But there appears no reason for his saying that the boy must have completed 11 years. It is only his opinion not based on any specific grounds. The witness, while in the box, was asked to examine the boy's teeth and he admits that one of the anterior premolars or bicuspids is just now making its appearance in the left lower jaw and that that tooth is generally cut between 9 and 10 ; and that the other three anterior premolars are milk teeth and have not yet been shed.

He also admits that the ridge observed in temporary teeth between the crown and the fan is not seen in this boy's teeth, though it is generally visible in the case of milk teeth but sometimes it is imbedded in the gum and is not visible. He also assumes, admittedly without any reason, that the ridge in the case of this boy is not imbedded in the gum. So, he is not justified in saying that the canines are permanent canines. Very probably, they are milk teeth, because it is only just now that one of the anterior premolars is making its appearanee. It is generally after the cutting of the anterior premolars between the 9th and 10th years that the canines make their appearance between the 10th and 13th years. I think it may be taken therefore to be clear that the canines are not permanent teeth but are only milk teeth, and that the boy (plaintiff 1) is aged between 9 and 10. This conclusion corroborates the defendants' case that the Birth Register (Exs. 14 and 15) relates to the birth of plaintiff 1. I must therefore find that plaintiff 1 was born on 11th March 1909 and was not born on the date of the sale deed, Ex. 10, and was not even in his mother's womb at that time. Consequently, plaintiff 2 also was not in existence on the date of the sale deed, Ex. 10.

Second part of the issue 1 :—I have to decide this issue on the assumption that both the plaintiffs or plaintiff 1 at least had been born or at least had been conceived before the date of the sale deed, Ex. 10. The plaintiffs' case in the plaint is that defendant 1 unnecessarily sold the house and spent the sale proceeds for immoral purposes instead of utilizing it for the purpose of plaintiffs' family. There is no allegation that the house was sold for an inadequate price. The defendants' case is that the house was sold for a proper value and there was a necessity for digging a well in the family garden and that a well was sunk with the sale proceeds soon after the sale. In deciding this issue, I shall first consider the fact whether a new well has been sunk by defendant 1 in the garden belonging to the family, or not. The plaintiffs' case is that no new well has been dug ; that there were two wells in the garden at the time of the partition ; and that there are even now two wells. Defendant 1 and his witnesses state that a new well was sunk by defendant 1 immediately after the sale to the north of the northern well previously in existence, and that the earth removed by digging that well was used to fill up the old northern well, which was not in a good condition and in which water could not be properly baled out for the reason that the soil was bad and the piccota could not stand steadily for the purpose of baling water.

No doubt, two wells are mentioned in the partition deed, Ex. B, as existing at that time in the garden. Now also admittedly, there are only two wells. But it will be seen from a reference to the old survey plan and the new survey plan (Exs. 11 and 12) produced by defendant 1 that the old northern well was situate farther south of the present northern well : there is nothing to show that these plans are inaccurate. They have been prepared by the Survey Department and it must be taken to be correct unless and until any mistake is pointed out therein. The new survey was in 1909. So, the new well must have been dug before the year 1909, and this supports the defendants' case that he dug the well in the year 1907 soon after the sale of the house. I find therefore that a new well, that is the present northern well, was dug by defendant about the year 1907 after the partition Ex. B.

With regard to the price obtained for the sale deed, it is mentioned in Ex. 10 and it is also proved to be Rs. 400. According to the defendants' witnessos, it is a proper price ; and seeing that the house was purchased by Arumugatha Gounden who is the owner of the house next adjoining the house in question, he is likely to have paid a higher price than what the others would have offered. Even according to P. W. 1's (i. e., plaintiffs' next friend's) present evidence, the house would have been worth only Rupees 500 at that time, but it must be remembered that the price of the house is given in the plaint as Rs. 200, and the value now given by P. W. 1 must certainly be somewhat exaggerated. I find therefore that the price obtained for the house, viz., Rs. 440, was a proper price. As to what happened with regard to the sale proceeds, defendant 1 states that he dug the new well with the sale proceeds and that the new well cost him about Rs. 400. His witnesses also state that he sunk a new well soon after the sale of the house, and that the cost of the well would be about Rs. 400 or Rs. 500. P. W. 1, Karichi Gounden, states that he has recently sunk a well, admittedly a smaller one (as seen from the measurements given by him), at a cost of Rs. 200. His present evidence must be taken with a certain amount of discount. I think the defendants' evidence could be believed. Seeing that the well was sunk soon after the sale of the house and seeing that there is no evidence to show defendant 1 was in possession of other funds for sinking the well, I hold that the sale proceeds were utilized for the purpose of sinking the new well.

Whether the sale was justified by necessity :—It appears from the evidence of defendant 1 and his witnesses that there was a necessity for digging a new well as the old northern well was not fit for use. It is only if there were means of irrigation that a number of crops could be raised in the garden and more profits could be obtained, I think that the purpose, viz., sinking a well, is a necessary purpose in the course of the management of the joint family property. It is suggested on the plaintiffs' side that defendant 1 could have borrowed money instead of selling this house. But borrowing of money implies the liability to pay interest periodically. Whereas the sale of one house from which no income could be derived and which was not necessary for residential purposes, there being another house for their residence, incurs no such liability to pay interest and does not deprive the family of any income which they had been getting. I find therefore that the sale of the house was justified by necessity.

Second issue :—I think that this issue relates to the value and the income of the family properties at the time of the sale deed Ex. 10. No doubt evidence has been adduced however with regard to the present value and income and with regard to the value and income about 10 years ago. Defendant 1 states that the garden belonging to the family, i e., Suit Nos. 81 and 82, are worth Rs. 4,000 now and yield an income of about Rs. 200 or Rs. 300 ; and he states that the value 10 years ago was about Rs 2,000 or 3,000 and income about Rs. 150. D. W. 5 Kasia Gounden, cousin of defendant 1, states that the garden is now worth Rs. 6,000 to Rs. 7,000 and the income will be about Rs. 400. He adds that the value 10 years ago would have been about Rs. 4,000 and the income Rs. 200. P. W. 1, Karichi Gounden, states that the present value of the garden is Rupees 10,000 and the income about Rs. 800 ; and he adds that the property was worth about Rs. 7,000, 10 years ago and that the income was Rs. 600 or Rs. 700. P. W. 5 Rama Gounden, states that the net income now will be about Rs. 650 and it was about 10 years ago about Rs. 400. As regards the other items of properties (immovable), they are :—(1) The house in which defendant 1 is living now ; (2) A kadu or punja in Palankarai (item 3 of the plaint). The residential house is valued in the plaint at Rs. 200. Defendant admits it is worth Rs. 300. As regards the punja kadu, it is seen from the evidence on both sides (defendant 1, D. W. 5 and P. W. 1) that it was worth about Rs. 100 about 10 years ago ; and that it is now worth Rs. 200 or Rs. 300.

It appears to be generally used as pasture lands and in some years, horsegram or some other gram (naripayar) is raised and even then the latter are allowed to be grazed by cattle. I do not think that this property was yielding any appreciable income. The total income of the properties, as given in the plaint is only Rs. 500, though the plaintiffs' next friend would now raise it to over Rs. 800. There is no other evidence that the family owned any other property, but defendant 1 admits that he has got cattle worth about Rs. 200 and that he has outstandings to the extent of Rs. 1,000. Taking all these facts into consideration, it appears to me that the garden (items 1 and 2 in the plaint Sch. 2, Part 3) was worth about Rs. 5,000 about 10 years ago and is now worth about Rs. 7,000 ; that its income was about Rs. 300, and it is now about Rs. 400. As regards item 3, its value 10 years ago must be fixed, I think, at about Rs. 100 and its present value will be fixed at Rs. 200 ; and it is not capable of producing any appreciable income. As regards the other house also, there is no income derivable therefrom. On the whole, I fix the value of the properties about 10 years ago at Rs. 5,400 excluding the house sold under Ex. 10 and the present value at Rs. 7,500. I fix the income of the properties at Rs. 300 about 10 years ago, and at Rs. 400 at present.

Judgment.—Plaintiff, the father, and his son gave a usufructuary mortgage of certain properties. Subsequently there was a division between father and son. The father redemed the whole of the properties and leased them to the present defendant who in court-sale purchased the son's share since his lease. The suit was to recover possession based on the lease. The District Munsif decreed the suit. The Subordinate Judge, we think very properly, directed a partition of the properties between the plaintiff and the defendant. The real question before us is whether the plaintiff is entitled to any thing more than interest from the defendants on the moiety which he paid to the mortgagee. Mr. Purushothama Aiyar relies on Asansab Ravuthan v. Vamana Rau (1) and Nainappa Chetty v. Chidambaram Chetti (2) for the proposition that a party redeeming the whole property is entitled to stand in the shoes of the mortgagee. But S. 95, T. P. Act, is clear that the person redeeming is not entitled to the rights of the mortgagee, but only to a charge for the excess sum he paid. As regards Asansab Ravuthan v. Vamana Rau (1), it is enough to say that that decision was passed before the Transfer of Property Act. As regards Nainappa Chetti v. Chidambaram Chetti (2), it was a case of simple mortgage. Consequently the question whether the person redeeming could obtain higher rights than that of a charge holder was not necessary for consideration in that case. In the face of the language of S. 95, T. P. Act, we are unable to give effect to the appellant's contention.

Another point has been raised regarding the plaintiff's rights to mesne profits since the expiry of the lease in 1912 and before possession was surrendered to him under the decree of the Court. Defendant contends that he was in possession only of the moiety purchased by him. The Subordinate Judge has not dealt with the question. We must ask him to submit a finding whether the defendant was in possession of the moiety now decreed to the plaintiff and if so, what is the amount of mesne profits payable to him in respect of that half from July 1912 to the date he took possession. No fresh evidence will be admitted. The finding will be submitted in six weeks and seven days are allowed for filing objections.

Finding.—I have been directed by the High Court to submit my finding on the following issue:

"whether the defendant was in possession of the moiety now decreed to the plaintiff, and if so, what is the amount of mesne profits payable to him in respect of that half from July 1912 to the date he took possession."

2. The plaintiff leased the whole of the suit lands to the defendant in 1910 and under that lease the defendant enjoyed them for two years 1910-1911 and 1911-1912. The defendant acquired ownership of one-half of them belonging to the plaintiff's son, Sambasiva Aiyar, on 2nd January 1912: vide Ex. 3. The accounts between them as regards the rent payable for the said two years were completely settled on 1st September 1912, on which date the plaintiff granted the receipt, Ex. D, to the defendant in evidence of the settlement and the payment of Rs. 58-13-4 in pursuance of the same. The question for determination under this issue is whether the defendant cultivated the whole of the lands consisting of the plaintiff's share and the plaintiff's son's share acquired by him through Ex. 3 from 1912 onwards, as he was doing in the two years preceding that year under the lease granted to him by the plaintiff or whether he cultivated only his share.

3. The defendant's case is that he refused to cultivate the plaintiff's share in 1912 and asked him to make his own arrangement for its cultivation and that he (defendant) has been cultivating and enjoying his half share only ever since. The plaintiff's case, on the other hand, as presented in the argument before me seems to be that as there was no partition by metes and bounds of the two shares he was not in a position to take possession of his half-share, that the defendant, as one originally let into possession of the whole lands as his lessee, should have delivered possession of the whole extent to the plaintiff, if he did not want to cultivate the plaintiff's share and should have sought his remedy for possession of his share by calling upon the plaintiff to come to a partition, that a mere expression of unwillingness on his part to cultivate the plaintiff's share did not amount to placing the plaintiff in possession of that share after the termination of the lease and that therefore the defendant is bound to pay mesne profits for the plaintiff's share till he was given actual possesssion of the same through Court. I think that the aspect from which the plaintff's pleader wants me to look at the defendant's conduct is too technical and that the correct way of looking at it will be to find out whether as a matter of fact, the defendant has been enjoying his half-share only in the suit lands or enjoying the whole. The very fact that the plaintiff's suit for possession of both the shares has failed shows that the said argument is unsound.

(1) [1878-80] 2 Mad. 223.

As it has been found that there was no partition of the two shares, the defendant must be deemed not to have been, no doubt, in a position to state to the plaintiff in 1912 what specific portions belonged to him and what to the plaintiff and to confine his cultivation to specific portions as constituting his share. But the evidence shows that he as a matter of fact, began to cultivate from 1912 onwards specified portions only in them, as constituting his share. It must be noted in this connexion that according to the defendant, there was a partition by metes and bounds of the two shares between him and the plaintiff, in which the portions cultivated by him fell to his share. This renders the defendant's case that he was enjoying specified portions as constituting his half-share intelligible, and probable, though his case that there was a partition to which the plaintiff was a party and in which he got the said portions for his share with the plaintiff's consent has not been accepted by the Courts. Though his case of partition has not been accepted, it might well be that he confined his enjoyment to specified portions as constituting his share at least to support the case set up by him.

The evidence also clearly shows that the defendant would not have enjoyed the whole. On 28th September 1912 the plaintiff sent a notice to the defendant demanding payment of his share of the kuruva crop then standing on the suit lands: vide Ex. H, dated 28th September 1912. The defendant swears that he gave a reply to it stating that he did not cultivate the plaintiff's share and the postal acknowledgment, Ex. 1, dated 2nd October 1912, supports his evidence that he sent a reply. The plaintiff stated in his chief examination that he did not receive any reply for Ex. H, but admitted in his cross-examination that the signature in Ex. 1 was his. I think that the fair inference to be drawn is that the defendant did send a reply notice to the effect that he did not cultivate the plaintiff's share. It is also noteworthy that in Ex. D, by the date of which also kuruva produce must have been raised on the suit lands, not a word was mentioned about the defendant having trespassed upon the plaintiff's share and cultivated that also. According to the plaintiff, there was an actual trespass of his share in July 1912 and not a mere holding over by the defendant after the expiration of the original lease granted to him by the plaintiff (as was the case in 1911) and kuruva cultivation of his share by the defendant without his consent. Under these circumstances one would expect some mention in Ex. D of such unauthorized cultivation. But on the other hand, Ex. D is couched in such terms that it leaves the impression in the mind of the reader that there was a complete adjustment of accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant as lessor and lessee and that nothing more remained to be done as between them with regard to the suit lands. No reservation of the plaintiff's rights to proceed against the defendant for the trespass was made therein.

Even the witness for the plaintiff, P. W. 2, states that the defendant told plaintiff that he did not want to cultivate the plaintiff's share and that plaintiff might make his own arrangement for its cultivation. He further states that on the dates of Ex. D, the plaintiff stated to the defendant, after granting that receipt, that nothing was due from the defendant to him. D. W. 2 the kurnam states that in Vyasi, i. e., May-June 1912 the defendant told the plaintiff to lease his share to somebody else, but that the plaintiff went away saying (do as you will). D. W. 3 also supports the defendant on this point. The evidence of the defendant's witnesses is to the effect that after the defendant gave out that he would not cultivate the plaintiff's share, he has been cultivating his share only and that the plaintiff's man a parayah, cultivated the plaintiff's share. There is no evidence on the plaintiff's side except the plaintiff's own word to counterbalance this.

It is also to be noted that though the District Musif has found against the theory of partition set up by the defendant, he was of the view that the defendant began to enjoy only specified portions of the suit lands as constituting his share some time after the symbolical delivery of his half-share obtained by him through Ex. G, though without the plaintiff's consent: vide para. 14 of his judgment. I find on this issue that the defendant has not enjoyed the plaintiff's share at any time after July 1912 and that therefore he is not liable to pay mesne profits for that share during the period mentioned in this issue, i. e., from July 1912 to the date when the plaintiff got delivery of his share through Court. Tha actual date on which the plaintiff got delivery of his share is not ascertainable from the record and I am therefore unable to arrive at a finding as to the quantum of mesne profits payable by the defendant to the plaintiff, in the event of my finding that he is not liable to pay any mesne profits not being accepted by the High Court.

Nalam Lakshmikantam and another—Defendants.

Original Civil Suit No. 147 of 1917, Decided on 5th November 1918.

Contract Act (9 of 1872), Ss. 56 and 73—Sale of goods—Transit by canal in boats—Delivery of part—Balance of goods under dispatch—Shortage of water in canal—Delay in delivery—Rescission of contract by vendee—Shipment of goods does not amount to delivery—Absence of facilities in transit does not excuse vendor on ground of impossibility of performance—Delay in delivery owing to causes beyond control—Vendee's repudiation of contract held unjustifiable.

Plaintiffs agreed to purchase from defendant 1 5,000 bags of Covelong salt at a fixed price and paid to defendant 1 as advance therefor Rs. 1,000 on 30th November 1916. The conditions of the contract were inter alia that defendant 1 was to dispatch the salt by boats from Covelong to Elephant Gate Basin, Madras, through the Buckingham Canal, and the amount due for each consignment was to be paid by the plaintiff before taking delivery at the Elephant Gate Basin. No time was fixed however for the delivery of the entire quantity of salt. The course of business adopted was that along with each consignment a watchman was sent by the vendor who was responsible for its custody. The dispatch of the salt and its expected arrival in Madras were notified by the vendor, not to the purchasers, but to his own agents in Madras and, when it did arrive, the latter either sent a delivery order to the purchasers or sent one of their own men to meet the boats with the purchasers' representative and indicate that delivery was to be made to the purchasers. Defendant 1 sent two consignments on 8th and 17th January 1917, totalling 740 bags, which were shipped on twelve canal boats. The remaining quantity was detained at Pappanchavidi, 13 miles from Covelong, as water in the canal was very low and the boats could proceed no further. The plaintiffs after complaining of the delay in delivery of the balance of the stipulated salt, formally rescinded the contract on 20th February 1917, and brought the present action for damages. The defendants pleaded: (1) that shipment of the salt amounted to delivery, (2) that they could not be held liable for the contract becoming impossible of performance owing to the state of the canal, and (3) that they had substantially performed the contract and that the plaintiffs' action in rescinding it was premature.

Held: (1) that the property in the goods did not pass on shipment, but that the vendor kept them as his property until they were paid for and delivered and that the appropriation at Covelong was conditional only; (2) that the absence of facilities in transit could not excuse defendant on the ground of impossibility of performance. The principle of the Coronation cases, Krell v. Henry, (1903) 2 K. B. 740, Expl.; (3) that the defendant having substantially performed the contract and discharged his obligation and the delay being attributable to causes beyond his control, plaintiffs' repudiation was unjustifiable.

Judgment.—This is a suit for damages for nondelivery of certain salt contracted to be delivered by the defendants to the plaintiffs. The facts of the case have taken some trouble to elucidate, but at the end of the case they were practically not in dispute. Defendant 2, Messrs. Holst and Nathan were added as parties to the suit on the motion of defendant 1, but a perusal of the agreement of 11th December 1915 between defendants 1 and 2 makes it clear that defendant 1 was to sell the salt covered by the agreement and that no privity of contract could possibly exist between Messrs. Holst and Nathan and third parties with whom defendant 1 entered into contracts. The contract sued upon is dated 30th November 1916. It recites an advance of Rs. 1,000 by the plaintiffs to defendant 1 for the supply of 5,000 bags of Covelong salt and is in the following terms:

"Received from Messrs. Mahomed Ibrahim Mahomed Jaffir and Co., Madras, the sum of Rupees 1,000 being the advance for the supply of 5,000 bags of Covelong salt for export from Madras to Calcutta under the following terms: (1) That the abovesaid company shall supply gunnies and twine at the Covelong Salt Factory. (2) That on receipt of gunnies, necessary application will be made for removal of salt. (3) That on obtaining permission from the Inspector for removal, the gunnies will be filled in as per rules of the department and the bags will be dispatched by boats from Covelong to Elephant Gate Basin, Madras. (4) That the said company will take delivery of the salt bags from boats immediately on arrival at the Basin. (5) That the rate fixed and approved for each bag of salt so delivered at Elephant Gate Basin is Rs. 3-4-6 per bag. (6) That the amount due for each consignment of salt at the abovementioned rate will be paid before taking delivery of the bags at the Elephant Gate Basin. (7) That the advance amount of Rs. 1,000 lodged with us will be adjusted at the last consignment while settling the whole account."

The course of business is this: the salt is collected from lands over which the sea flows in the neighbourhood of Covelong and put into the Government Salt Factory at that place for cleansing and refinement. It is taken out of the factory by the contractors in the position of the defendants, who have to provide gunny bags to pack it with and to pay the price and the tax. The Buckingham Canal goes past Covelong and there is a wharf within the boundaries of the factory, from which the bags of salt can be loaded into boats for conveyance by the canal to Madras. By the terms of the contract the plaintiffs were to supply the gunny bags and twine for receiving the salt. In practice the defendants take a lump sum from the plaintiffs to cover the cost of the bags and provide them themselves. It is now beyond dispute that there was ample salt at Covelong at the disposal of defendants for them to fulfil their contract and they could not and do not attempt to show that there were not enough bags into which to pack the salt. The trouble arose over the conditions of the waterway and the facilities of dispatch. The first two consigments were sent off on 8th and 17th January and totalled 740 bags shipped on 12 canal boats. The subsequent dispatches were as follows:

Date of Dispatch.	No. of boats.	No. of bags.
25th January	4	300
1st February	6	507
2nd ,,	6	400
9th ,,	10	600
10th ,,	12	745
16th ,,	17	1,000
5th March	7	500

Under normal conditions the transit from Covelong to Madras takes three or four days, and I think I may assume that, if the boats had arrived in Madras after the normal interval from their dispatch from Covelong, there would have been a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract. In fact during the latter part of January and whole of February the water in the Buckingham Canal was very low and the boats arrived as far as Papanchavadi, which is some 13 miles from Covelong and 9 to the Elephant Gate Basin, and proceeded no further. It is suggested that the boats might have been got to Madras by one or two methods, either by using portage over the shallow places and reloading the cargo where the water was deep enough again or by distributing the cargo of the fully laden boats among other boats and so ensuring that no boat had so heavy a load that she could not be pulled through the shallowest part. I do not doubt that both of the suggested courses were physically possible. I am convinced that as a matter of business both were commercially impracticable. It is reasonably clear from the evidence that there were not enough boats available for all the cargo to be carried through in half-laden boats, and with regard to the portage scheme, though it may be theoretically possible, the evidence is conclusive that no one has ever attempted to do it with a cargo of salt. The figures given by the lock-keeper at Adayar South Lock appear to me to be conclusive on this point. He has produced the record of the boats carrying salt cargoes for the months of January, February and March, and it speaks for itself. In the month of January 80 boats went through the lock with salt cargoes, 29 from 1st to 10th, 21 from 11th to 20th and 30 from 21st to 31st. In the month of February not one single boat went through with a salt cargo, though 264 boats went through loaded with cargoes of different descriptions. In the month of March no salt boat went through from 1st to 20th and one only from 21st to 31st. During that month 346 boats went through carrying other cargoes. The result was that the boats laden with salt destined to fulfil this contract stopped at Pappanchavidi, nine miles from their destination, and the evidence has satisfied me that it was commercially impracticable that they should do otherwise.

The effect of this state of things on the contracting parties and how they dealt with it can be seen from the correspondence to which I now turn. The shortage was beginning to be felt towards the end of January and the plaintiffs' vakil, Mr. Narayanasawmi Aiyar, addressed a letter on 22nd January to defendant 1 in the following terms:

"With reference to the letter dated 18th January 1917 addressed by Messrs. Holst and Nathan to my clients Messrs. Mahomed Ibrahim and Mahomed Jaffiir & Co., carrying on business at No. 55 Kandappa Chetty Street, Georgetown, Madras, I have been instructed to state that though my clients have been going to Elephant Gate and making inquiries there and also of you for the last three days, they are informed that no boats containing the consignment referred to in the said letter have yet arrived at Elephant Gate Basin. My clients further instruct me to state that by agreement dated 30th November 1916 you have agreed that on obtaining permission from the Inspector for removal of salt and for exporting the same to Calcutta you would dispatch the salt to my clients, that you on or about 20th December 1916 obtained permission from the Inspector for such removal and export and that you have not yet sent the salt stipulated for in the said agreement to my clients. My clients further state with each consignment of goods stipulated for you must send a certificate that it contains Covelong salt. My clients again instruct me to call upon you to deliver to them the balance of 4,660 bags of Covelong salt with the certificate referred to above and also send them the permission from the Inspector mentioned above, and to give you notice that if you fail to comply with the said request on or before the 31st of this month, they will cancel the agreement entered into by them with you on 30th November 1916 and sue you for damages incurred by them for breach of the said agreement."

That was answered by a letter from defendant 1 on 24th January of which the material passage is as follows:

"We have come to understand that owing to there being no water in the Buckingham Canal the passage of boats has become very difficult and we are not in the least responsible for the delay in transport of these bags, as we have no control over this contingency. We have to make you distinctly understand that we have not made any contract to supply the goods within any stipulated time."

It is quite true that there was no stipulated time for the performance of the contract, but is not disputed that whatever the defendant was under an obligation to do under the terms of his contract, and that is a matter which I will discuss hereafter, he had to do it within a reasonable time. On 30th January another letter was sent by the plaintiffs' vakil which complained of the shortage of the supply of salt and threatened to cancel the contract if delivery of the outstanding balance of over 4,000 bags was not made within five days. That was answered by a letter from the defendant, which bears no date but was obviously written at the beginning of February, explaining that the failure of water in the canal was the cause of the shortage of supply and offering to give delivery at Papanchavidi and to make concession in the question of the cost of conveyance by land from Papanchavidi to Elephant Gate. On 20th February a letter was written on behalf of the plaintiffs, which in effect was a repudiation of the contract. It is not disputed that at that time no more than the first consignment of 740 bags dispatched early in January had reached the plaintiffs and it is equally clear that upwards of 4,000 bags had been loaded by the defendant at Covelong. The question I have to decide is whether that repudiation was justified or not. That again turns upon the question, whether the delay in transit under the terms of the contract and the course of dealing between the parties falls upon the plaintiffs or the defendant. A point was taken for the defendant, which I suggested myself in the course of the argument and which I think being entirely a point of law on the construction of the contract was open to the defendant, viz., that he discharged his obligation when he shipped the goods on board the boats at Covelong. Cl. 3 of the contract provides that the bags are to be dispatched by boats from Covelong to Elephant Gate Basin, and it is urged that, when they were put on boats at Covelong, the obligation of the defendant in that respect was discharged, in other words, that this was in effect an

f. o. b. contract. Fragano v. Long (1), Tregelles v. Sewell (2) and Wiltshire Iron Company, In re Pearson, Ex parte (3) were cited as illustrating this position. But in the English shiping cases one usually has a bill of lading or a policy of insurance or both, the custody of which at any given moment of the transaction is a guide to help one in determining at what point of time the property passed, and in this case, of course, there is nothing of the sort.

The plaintiffs relied upon the latter clauses of the contract, Nos. 7, 5 and 6, as showing that the property in the goods was not intended to pass until they were delivered on payment at Elephant Gate Basin. The defendant contends that these terms relate merely to payment, and, while conceding that the effect of the contract may be to disentitle him from suing for the price of the goods until they arrived at Elephant Gate Basin, argues that he is nevertheless not liable for damages for delay during transit. If that were the position in law, it would approximate to that in the well-known case of Calcutta and Burmah Steam Navigation Company Limited v. De Mattos (4). In that case De Mattos agreed to ship coal from London to Rangoon there to be delivered to the buyers. Half the price was to be paid on shipment against delivery of invoices and bills of landing and a policy for half the invoice amount. Some of the goods were lost during the voyage and it was held that the property passed to the buyers on shipment although by the special terms of the contract the vendor was not entitled to recover the price until the goods arrived at Rangoon. That state of things is admirably expressed in a passage of the judgment of Blackburn, J., at p. 328, which runs as follows:

"But the parties may intend an intermediate state of things; they may intend that the vendor shall deliver the goods to the carrier, and that when he has done so, he shall have fulfilled his undertaking so that he shall not be liable in damages for a breach of contract if the goods do not reach their destination; and yet they may intend that the whole or part of the price shall not be payable unless the goods do arrive. They may bargain that the property shall vest in the purchaser, as owner as soon as the goods are shipped, that they shall then be both sold and delivered, and yet that the price (in whole or in part) shall be payable only on the contingency of the goods arriving; just as they might, if they pleased, contract that the price should not be payable unless a particular tree falls, but without any contract on the vendor's part in the one case to procure the goods to arrive, or in the other to cause the tree to fall. Where the contract is of this kind, the position of the vendor and purchaser, in case the goods do not arrive is analogous to that of freighter and shipowner, in the ordinary contract of carriage on board a ship in case the goods are prevented from arriving by one of the excepted perils. The shipowner is not bound to carry and deliver at all events; but, though he is excused if prevented by the excepted perils, yet no freight is earned or payable unless the goods are delivered."

Certain facts relating to the course of business were proved in this case which, to my mind, preclude me from holding that the property passed to the buyer on shipment. The effect of that evidence is shortly this, when the salt was dispatched on its journey, a watchman was sent with it who was responsible for its custcdy and who was employed and paid by the vendors. The dispatch of the salt and its expected arrival at Madras was notified by the vendors from Covelong not to the puchaser but to their own agents in Madras; and when it did arrive, the vendors in Madras either sent a delivery order to the purchaser or sent one of their men to meet the boats with the purchaser's representative and indicate that delivery was to be made to the purchaser. These facts appear to me to establish that the vendors effectually reserved to themselves the jus disponendi and that though the placing of the salt in bags marked with the purchaser's initials at Covelong was undoubtedly an appropriation of the goods, it was a conditional appropriation only : see Mirabita v. Imperial Ottoman Bank (5), Gabarrow v. Kreeft (6) and Moakes v. Nicolson (7). I am therefore of opinion that by this contract the property in the goods did not pass on shipment, but that the vendor kept them as his property until they should be paid for and delivered and that the appropriation at Covelong was conditional only.

It was next argued for the defendant that this case fell within the principle of what are called the Coronation cases, Krell v. Henry (8) and the rest, and that assuming the vendor to have taken the responsibility of carriage and delivery upon himself, he was excused by the impossibility of performance. I understand the Coronation cases and the older cases which they followed to establish this proposition, that where the contract between the parties is made wholly with reference to a state of things which was supposed to exist and on the supposition that that state of things does exist, the contractual obligation is dissolved if, in fact, the circumstances on which the whole contract is based do not exist. A contract to sing or play in a particular hall is dissolved if, unknown to the parties, the hall has been burned down. A contract with a hirer of seats to view a public ceremony is dissolved if that public ceremony is cancelled and cannot take place. I do not think that the principles enunciated in these cases have any application here. It seems to me impossible to say that these parties based their contract on the supposition that clear facilities of transport existed between Covelong and Madras in such a sense that their contract could be said to be deprived of its fundamental assumption and to become meaningless and insignificant if those facilities did not exist.

The last point taken by the defendant is to my mind conclusive. Accepting the position that he reserved the property in the goods to himself and that it did not pass on shipment, and admitting there was no such impossibility as would excuse him on the principle enunciated in the Coronation cases, he contends that he has substantially complied with the obligations cast upon him by the contract. His obligation on this footing no doubt was to deliver the goods at Madras, but the mode of transit contemplated by the parties was that he should ship the goods at Covelong on the boats ordinarily available for conveying salt from Covelong to Madras by the Buckingham Canal. That being the method of transit contemplated by the parties. the defendant contends that he is not in default and that he has shown his ability to deliver the goods "within reasonable time." The plaintiffs' repudiation was on 20th February. Had they not repudiated on that date, it is reasonably clear and I so find as a fact that they would have had delivery of the balance of the contract quantity at the end of March and the beginning of April. The question is whether that is delivery "within a reasonable time." On this point I shall refer to the well-known cases relating to a charter's liability for demurrage or damages for detention when he is under an obligation to discharge the ship according to the custom of the port with due dispatch : see Postlethwaite v. Freeland (9), Hick v. Raymond (10), Carlton Steamship Company v. Castle Mail Packets Company (11) and Hulthen v. Stewart & Co. (12). These cases appear to me to lay down the principle that the question of what is a reasonable time for the performance of the contract is one to be decided not by general abstract considerations but by the particular circumstance of each case. The principle appears to me to be most clearly expressed in the words of Lord Watson in Hick v. Raymond (10), where his Lordship uses these words:

> "When the language of a contract does not expressly, or by necessary implication, fix any time for the performance of a contractual obligation, the law implies that it shall be performed within a reasonable time. The rule is of general application, and is not confined to contracts for the carriage of goods by sea. In the case of other contracts the condition of reasonable time has been frequently interpreted; and has invariably been held to mean that the party upon whom it is incumbent duly fulfils his obligation, notwithstanding protracted delay, so long as such delay is attributable to causes beyond his control, and he has neither acted negligently nor unreasonably."

The unsuccessful contention in each of these cases was that you could ascertain what was a reasonable time in normal circumstances for discharge of the ship and translate the indefinite words of the contract into terms of days and hours. The House of Lords throughout refused to accept this contention and laid it down that in every case you must have regard to the particular circumstances and conditions existing at the moment. Following that principle I think I must hold that I must have regard to the failure of water in the Buckingham canal at the material times, to the number of boats actually available and to the fact that no one attempted to to carry salt cargoes beyond Pappanchavidi in February and March as indicating that the delay in transit was attributable to causes beyond the control of the vendors and that they had acted neither negligently nor unreasonably.

I must accordingly find that the defendant has discharged his obligations under the contract and is not liable in damages for delay in delivery to the plaintiffs. On the other hand, he cannot, in my opinion, retain the advance of Rs. 1,000 and the money paid for the gunny bags, except in so far as he can set off against them the price of the 740 gunny bags actually delivered. In the result there will be judgment for the plaintiffs for Rs. 2,491 with vakil's fee and institution fees on that amount as costs. The whole case was fought on the question of damages as to which the defendant has succeeded. I decline therefore to give plaintiffs the hearing fees. On the other hand the defendant did not bring into Court the money due on the deposit and the bags; and I must therefore decline to give him costs, though on the issue really fought he has succeeded. Interest at 6 per cent on this amount. The plaintiff must pay the costs of defendant 2: but may add them to the costs he recovers from defendant 1: see Bullock v. London General Omnibus Company (13).

Second Appeal No. 987 of 1917, Decided on 10th October 1918, against decree of Dist. Judge, Chingleput, in Appeal Suit No. 253 of 1914.

Limitation Act (1908), Art. 124—"Defendant" includes person through whom he claims—Suit for possession of office of archaka against existing incumbent—Defendant can tack on possession of his predecessors to his in establishing adverse enjoyment.

The word "defendant" in Col. 3, Art. 124, includes the persons from or through whom a person derives his liability to be sued [P 293 C 1]

Therefore in a suit, for the possession of the office of archaka of a temple against the existing incumbent, who has been in possession for less than 12 years, the defendant is entitled to tack on the possession of his predecessors to his own in establishing a plea of adverse enjoyment, where all of them owed their appointment to the trustees of the temple. [P 293 C 1]

T. Narasimha Aiyangar and N. K. Rangasami Aiyangar—for Appellants.

S. Swaminathan—for Respondents.

Judgment.—In this second appeal, the question which arises is whether plaintiffs, who, according to the finding, were at one time hereditary archakas of the suit temple but had been out of possession and enjoyment of that office for about 60 years, were barred under Art. 124, Lim. Act, when they brought this suit against defendant 5, the archaka in possession, and defendants 1 to 4 the trustees of the temple, by whom this archaka and the preceding archakas for many years have been appointed. In the plaint the plaintiffs claimed to recover possession of the office of archaka from defendant 5, and they claimed an injunction restraining defendants 1 to 4, the trustees, from causing any obstruction to them or to any one else who performed the duties of archaka on their behalf. Under Art. 124, Lim. Act, for possession of an hereditary office, time runs against the plaintiff from the time when the defendant takes possession of the office adversely to the plaintiff, and to preclude any difficulty as to what was meant by the possession of an hereditary office, the explanation says :

"An hereditary office is possessed when the profits thereof are usually received, or (if there are no profits) when the duties thereof are usually performed."

It is not denied that defendant 5 in this case has taken possession of the office, but it is said that he took possession within 12 years, so that the suit is not barred as against him. The question then aries whether under the definition of "defendant" in S. 2, sub-S. (4), Lim. Act, which enacts that "defendant includes any person from or through whom a defendant derives his liability to be sued," the present defendant 5 must not be considered to derive his liability from or through his predecessors in the office, all of whom like himself for many years held the office of archaka by virtue of their appointment by the trustees of the temple. The trustees of the temple are the persons in whom the right to appoint archakas is vested, when that office is not hereditary. Now it has been held in Raja of Palghat v. Raman Unni (1), following other cases including Pydi- gantan Jagannadha Row v. Rama Doss Patnaik (2), that in the case of successive holders of a stanom, they claim from or through each other within the definition of "plaintiff" in the Limitation Act, and there are similar decisions about heads of mutts and other persons in a similar position. We think that the same principle applies to the present case. Here all these successive archakas had held office one after another, claiming under the same right, namely, appointment by the trustees of the temple. In the case of stanikas, it is the peculiar rule of succession that confers their appointment upon them. In this case the rule of law is that a trustee of a temple can appoint archakas where the office is not hereditary. There is no substantial distinction, it seems to us, between the two cases. Here all the archakas, who have been in possesion of their office now for nearly 60 years have held their office by virtue of their appointment by the temple trustees. We think that the word "defendant" in Col. 3, Art. 124, includes defendant 5's predecessors, and therefore as more than 12 years have elapsed since the defendant took possession, the suit is barred. As was pointed out by Subramania Aiyar, J., in Pydigantam Jagannadha Row v. Rama Doss Patnaik (2), any other ruling would go far to destroy the effect of the Limitation Act, because there would be no limit of time whatever unless the defendants were able to prove that some particular holder of the archaka office had been in possession for more than 12 years.

Defendant 5 did not appeal from the decree passed against him by the District Munsif. But the District Judge held that the plaintiffs' suit was barred, and appears to have dismissed the suit against him also. In this, we think, he was quite right. It was necessary to give effect to the rights of the parties as established by the decree that the suit against him also should be dismissed and the plaintiffs prevented from interfering in the affairs of the temple. In the result, the second appeal is dismissed with costs.

T. Narasimha Aiyangar—for Appellants.

T. R. Venkatarama Sastri—for Respondents.

Wallis, C. J.—The question is whether the compensation awarded under the Land Acquisition Act for certain lands in a village in Tinnevelly should be apportioned between the pattadar, a registered holder, which in this case is a temple, and the raiyats under it on the basis that the raiyats have occupancy rights in the lands, a claim which the District Judge has rejected. The fifth report speaks of a practice in Tinnevelly under which land, which had been under cultivation by the mirasidars or hereditary owners and had afterwards been left uncultivated by them, was cultivated by others who paid them 13 per cent. of the produce as swami bogam and divided the rest between the Government and themselves. There was a somewhat similar usage in Chingleput, Mr. Venkatarama Sastri for the respondent in this case says that it has not been proved that these lands were cultivated by the tenants in this way. All that we know is that in 1817 a pious founder acquired at a revenue sale a five-sixths interest in the lands in this village, and that he acquired the remaining one-sixth under Ex. JJ. Ex. JJ. is a sale of the one-sixth share of the land and does not refer to the existence of any persons on the land in the enjoyment of occupancy right. As regards the remaining five-sixths also, the presumption would appear to be that at the revenue sale what was purchased was the land. It may be that some, at any rate, of the predecessors of these tenants were on the land at that date but of that there is no evidence. Ex. CC/ 1835 is an order of the Board of Revenue to the Collector to ressume the villages owing to diversion of the revenues to private purposes. It probably meant that the Collector was to manage under Regulation 7 of 1817. Ex. DD of 1842 ordered the villages to be handed over to the founder's son, who is to make arrangements to "manage the cultivation" and other business. Mr. Venkatarma Sastri relies strongly on this expression as negativing the existence of hereditary cultivators and showing that the trustee on behalf of the temple had the right to cultivate the land himself. If so this would be against the claim to occupancy right.

Exhibit FF is a cadjan muchilika executed by the tenants in 1856, in which they acknowledge they have received an adaolai or lease from the temple. If they do not observe its terms they are to be liable to eviction. They are to wait on the trustee every three years and to receive an adaolai like the one that had been granted to them, and in default were to abide his pleasure. This document does not seem to be conclusive either way, and was found not to have been proved by Mr. Goldie, the District Judge, in the appeal referred to below. Ex. GG of October 1857 and the following documents show that there was a dispute as to the proper entries to be made in the village accounts. Till 1856 the patta had been in the name of the temple and the names of the cultivators had been shown as in actual enjoyment, but apparently without reference to separate plots. As he considered the cultivators had only the right of cultivation, the karnam in the new accounts had not entered their names. The trustee was anxious that his name should be entered, but the Collector's Assistant thought it better that he should be shown as being in enjoyment as hukdar. Ex. GG 1, the register of personal complaints of 17th January 1859, shows that in that year the cultivators complained that "though the village had all along belonged only to the raiyats." it had been registered in the name of the trustee. The order refused to cancel the right of the hukdar in the patta or to register them as in enjoyment and referred them to a civil suit. Ex. HH is a razinamah setting forth a complaint made by the hukdar's lessee against the raiyats which was settled in the lessee's favour.

Exhibit 2, dated 12th October 1859, shows that the hukdar filed a revenue suit against the tenants to enforce the acceptance of adaolais, which was dismissed by the acting Collector for default. At the same time he passed an order with reference to the raiyats' claim to be entered as in enjoyment. They had admitted that the lands were the property of the pagoda, but objected to the entry of the hukdar as in enjoyment. The Collector observed that the entry of his name in the column of remarks tended to create disputes and mislead the authorities to the possible prejudice of the raiyats' rights in the soil. He accordingly directed the trustee's name to be struck out and the names of the raiyats entered. For arrears of revenue the raiyats' crops were not to be liable but the land. This order was apparently confirmed by the Collector, and thereupon the hukdar filed Original Suit No. 28 of 1856 in the Tinnevelly Munsif's Court. The plaint Ex. A alleges in para. 4 that prior to 1856 the hukdar had been in the habit of leasing the village to defendants 2, 5, 18, 43 and 46, who were cultivators in the village, and that these lessees let out the land to the other defendants for cultivation and cultivated it. It was very common for the landlord to arrange with a few leading villagers for the cultivation of the village and leave them to make their own arrangements with the other villagers and as pointed out in Chidambara Pillai v. Thiruvengadathiengar (1) this, if established, would negative the existence of occupancy right. The plaint also relied on Ex. FF in the present suit, the muchilika executed on 25th November 1856 by 33 defendants said to be the leading villagers, and alleged that defendant 7 had refused to execute the muchilika and induced the other tenants not to pay their rents. Several of the defendants asserted that the lands had been reclaimed by them, and alleged that the temple was only entitled to the swami bogam. 71 defendants admitted the plaintiff's claim. The principal Munsif gave a judgment for the plaintiff. The District Judge confirmed the decrees as regards the 71 who had admitted the plaintiff's claim, but reversed it for misjoinder as regards the other defendants: Ex. A-4 of 12th June 1861. Eighty-eight of the other defendants then conpromised the case in the District Court, Exs. B to B-4 series, to avoid the expense of suit on the terms of accepting the decree of the Munsif's Court directing them to surrender possession. Twenty-eight defendants held out and after decrees had been passed against them by the Munsif succeeded in getting those decrees reversed by the District Court in Appeal Suit No. 110 of 1864, Ex. V dated 2nd February 1865, and the connected suits, which were confirmed on second appeal by the High Court. The District Judge in Ex. V gave reasons for not accepting the genuineness of Ex. FF already referred to and stated that the plaintiff's own witnesses admitted that the defendant had been in possession of the lands in suit for nearly 20 years and of the house for over 30 years, and considering the defendant had proved that the disputed lands had been in his and his family's undisturbed possession for a very long period and that his tenancy was a permanent tenancy dismissed the plaintiff's suit in ejectment. It had been previously ruled by Scotland and Holloway, JJ., in Alagaiya Tiruchittambala v. Saminada Pillai (2) that the question whether raiyats under the mirasidar have a title to the permanent occupancy of land subject to the payment of the mirasidar's share for the most part depended on established usage and custom, which had to be proved. The High Court in the second appeals apparently accepted the findings of the District Judge that it had been proved in this case. We next come to Original Suit No. 31 of 1884 on the file of the Subordinate Court of Tinnevelly, another suit for ejectment and other similar suits. In his judgment II-2, dated 17th December 1885, the Subordinate Judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that the defendant's father had admitted the plaintiff's right in the suit of 1859.

Exhibit T, dated 21st July 1886, is judgment in Original Suit No. 42 of 1884, a suit to fix the rent payable by plaintiff to defendant on account of defendant's refusal to receive rent at a rate alleged to have been fixed by his father in 1867 in one of the areas in which permanent tenure had been established in the litigation already mentioned. In Ex. V (c) in Original Suit No. 9 of 1901 in the District Munsif's Court of Srivaikuntam, a suit by the hukdar for ejectment, it was found by the District Munsif that the tenants were not entitled to occupancy rights by virtue of the decisions in the previous suit but that their right of occupancy was established independently' In Ex VII (e), Original Suit No. 23 of 1905, in the District Munsif's Court, a suit for ejectment was allowed to be withdrawn with liberty to bring a fresh suit In Original Suit No. 637 of 1906 in the District Munsif's Court, another suit for ejectment, it was held to be res judicata as regards the particular land that there was no occupancy right. The trustee also relies on NN series which he took in 1884.

The appellants rely on numerous transfers since 1884, sales both private and in execution and mortgages of their interests by tenants The District Judge has held that these were not brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff. If the transfers were genuine the plaintiff must have received the rents from the transferees and I think the appellants are entitled to contend that his failure to produce his accounts raises an inference against him in this respect.

Now as to the presumption to be applied to the case, the reason that the Courts, even before the passing of the Madras Estates Land Act 1908, raised a presumption of occupancy right in favour of raiyats holding under a permanently settled zamindar, and not in favour of raiyats holding under a raiyatwari pattadar was that there was no presumption in the case of the permenently settled zamindar that he was the owner of the land except as assignee of the Government interest therein, whereas the scheme of the temporary raiyatwari settlements was to settle the revenue with the owner of the land himself. In neither case it is well established was there any intention to interfere with the legal relationship that might exist between the person with whom the revenue settlement was made and those holding under him.

The presumption being that the raiyawari pattadar was the owner of the land the Courts have proceeded on the view that the burden is on his tenants claiming a permanant right of occupancy to proveit. I have recently dealt in Muna Muhammad Rowther v. Muthu Alagappa Chettiar (3) with the Tanjore temple cases in which this was laid down, and followed the ruling in Chidambara Pillai v. Thiruvengadathiengar (1), which has been approved in subsequent cases. Those Tanjore cases had a special history and facts in common which differentiate them from cases such as the present, and led, except in one case, to the rejection of the claim to occupancy right. All that was laid down generally in Chidambara Pillai v. Thiruvengadathiengar (1) and cases which followed it was that the onus was on the tenant and that mere length of enjoyment in the capacity of tenants or purakudies, irrespective of other circumstances, did not raise a presumption of occupancy right. The qualification is important, because it shows that the inference as to occupancy right is to depend on a consideration of the whole circumstances of the case, and among those circumstances are the continuance of the lands in the same hands at unenhanced rents, especially if they are low, the recognition of the tenant's right to transfer his holding, etc., as pointed out by the Privy Council in Ram Chunder Dutt v. Jugesh Chunder Dutt (4), Naba Kumari Debi v. Behari Lal Sen (5), Upendra Krishna Mandal v. Ismail Khan Mahomed (6) and Nilratan Mandal v. Ismail Khan Mahomed (7). The same thing was laid bown in Peria Karuppan v. Annasawmi Ayer (8) and Venkatachala Goundan v. Rangaratnam Aiyar (9). These are facts which it is for the tenant to establish.

The task of drawing the right inference in the present case is one of some difficulty, which is increased by the fact that the claim is in respect of compensation awarded for land taken from different holdings, as to which, owing to the facts set out above, the rights of the tenants may be different, and because the evidence does not enable us to trace the history of the respective holdings from which the acquisition was made in the dispute about the existence of occupancy right which has been going on with varying fortunes in the village for the last 60 years. The fifth report shows that in Tinnevelly before the settlement of the revenue at the beginning of last century there were raiyats holding with rights of occupancy under the mirasidars. If that was the case in the suit village I do not think that it matters that a five-sixths share in the village was purchased for the temple at a revenue sale because, even if the land was sold free of encumbrances, the presumption in the circumstances would be that the temple continued the tenancies on the old footing. There is however no evidence that this was the state of things in the suit village, and the order of 1848, Ex. DD, as to the temple arranging for the cultivation points the other way. The fact that 28 raiyats established their occupancy rights in the litigation which began in 1859, though it does not make the issue res judicata as regards the lands now in suit, is entitled to considerable weight, but the reversing judgment of the District Judge, which was confirmed by the High Court without comment on second appeal apparently, as a finding of fact, does not appear to me to give reasons which would now be regarded as sufficient to establish the claim to occupancy rights. On the other hand, we have the fact that the great majority of the tenants had given up their claim to occupancy rights at an earlier stage of the litigation.

As regards the rates of rent the sharing or waram system seems to have prevailed until 1867 as regards nunja or wet land and to have been commuted at that time. It is not shown that the temple's shares was less than that of ordinary owners, or that the punja money rates were unduly low. As regards the evidence that the rents have not been raised since, and the evidence, which is all of it fairly recent, that the tenants have been freely allowed by the temple to transfer their holdings, I do not think that in the present case it can be treated as a recognition by the temple of the existence of occupancy rights, because it is clear that for the last 60 years the temple has been openly and notoriously contesting the existence of occupancy rights in the village in the numerous proceedings which I have mentioned above. In these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that there are not sufficient reasons for differing on the main question from the conclusion on the evidence at which the learned District Judge has arrived and which has also been arrived at by my learned brother. In this and other respects I agree in the order proposed by him.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—These 11 appeals have been preferred against the judgments of the District Judge of Tinnevelly refusing compensation under the Land Acquisition Act to the appellants, and awarding it entirely to the respondents. The lands are situated in a village called Kachanavilai. It is common ground that about the year 1817, five-sixths of the village was purchased at a revenue sale by one Vengu Mudaliar; and the other sixth at a private sale. The lands were dedicated as an endowment for the performance of a kattalai in a temple. The respondents represent the founder of the kattalai and claiming to be the sole trustees contended that the proprietary right in the lands belongs exclusively to the kattalai. The defendants, on the other hand, alleged that they and their ancestors have been in uninterrupted enjoyment of the lands paying the Sircar kist either direct or through the hukdar and paying the hukdar a low and uniform rate of rent. They therefore claimed to have occupancy right in the lands. The District Judge held that the occupancy right was not established. Hence these appeals.

A brief narration of the previous litigation in connexion with this village must be given in order to appreciate properly the arguments addressed to us on the present occasion. The raiyatwari patta for the village stands in the name of the temple (vide MM series). As to when the first patta was granted there is no reliable evidence. But we know from Ex. DD, dated 7th September 1842, that the Collector ordered the Tahsildar to issue patta to the temple. MM (1858-1859) is the earliest patta that has been produced. A few years before MM the cultivators of the village executed a joint muchilika in which they stipulated that they shall receive on adaolai every three years in respect of the properties under their cultivation. There is a condition in it that if the cultivators failed to act properly, the hukdar was entitled to resume the lands. This was on 25th November 1856. Then some correspondence passed as to whether the hukdar's name should be entered in the patta. The tenants apparently claimed even at this date that their names should be inserted as persons in occupation (vide GG series). In consequence of these disputes the Collector ordered that the name of Vengu Mudaliar should be struck out and that the cultivators' names should be entered instead (Ex. 2). This was on 12th October 1859. Thereupon Vengu Mudaliar brought a suit in the Court of the Sadar Amin, Tinnevelly, to eject the cultivators and to recover arrears of rent from them (vide Ex. A dated 17th December 1859).

The principal Sadar Amin gave a decree, as prayed for (Ex. A-4). It may be mentioned here that there was, but one suit against all the cultivators, who numbered nearly 270. 71 of them admitted the right of the plaintiff. A number of other defendants did not file any written statement. 65 defendants alone contested the plaintiff's claim. An appeal was preferred against the judgment of the Sadar Amin. Mr. Goldie, the then District Judge, without expressing any opinion on the merits held that the suit was bad for misjoinder of parties and causes of action and reversed the Sadar Amin's decision (Ex. 5). Even after this reversal a large number of the defendants entered into a razinamah with Vengu Mudaliar by which they acknowledged the title of the hukdar to eject them and agreed that if they failed to obey the condition of the razinamah, they shall be bound by the decree passed by the Sadar Amin on the merits. The one suit was split up into a number of suits and the Sadar Amin once again went into the merits of the case and came to the same conclusion as before. Against his decree 28 cultivators preferred appeals to Mr. Goldie. He held that as the cultivators had been in possession for 20 or 30 years they were entitled to occupancy rights. The special appeals preferred to the High Court were summarily dismissed. It is apparent from what I have stated that 28 of the defendants who were originally impleaded in the suit established their rights in the High Court. Exs. D, E, F, G to S show that proceedings in ejectment were taken against some of the other cultivators.

The next litigation was in the year 1884 (vide Ex. T), in which the question regarding the proprietary rights in the soil was not considered. The question was about the rates of rent that should be paid to the hukdar. Then comes Ex. 5 (c), which was a suit instituted in the year 1901 in the District Munsif's Court, Srivaikuntam. About 11 cultivators contested the right of the hukdar to eject them. The Munsif came to the conclusion that they had acquired occupancy right. It is not clear whether there was any appeal in these cases. Matters seemed to have gone on smoothly until the Government proclaimed in 1915 that they intended to acquire the lands in dispute for the Tiruchandur Railway. As a consequence of this notification the cultivators have preferred claims to a share in the compensation on the ground that they have occupancy rights in the land.

Four of these appeals may be disposed of at once. They are Appeals Nos. 241, 245, 248 and 249. The District Judge in the last paragraph of his judgment says that the lands in respect of which compensation was claimed in these four appeals were delivered over to the respondents' predecessor-in-title by virtue of proceedings in execution taken by him. Ex. C shows that a large number of the cultivators were evicted from their holdings for failure to comply with the conditions of the razinamah embodied in Ex. B. The District Judge has stated that the appellants in those four appeals were among those against whom proceedings were thus taken. There was no ground of appeal disputing the correctness of the statement made by the District Judge. We are not prepared to allow that question now to be reopened. We must therefore hold that the proceedings taken under Ex. C are binding upon the appellants and that they are estopped from claiming occupancy rights.

Now we have to deal with the seven appeals on the merits. Mr. Narasimha Aiyangar for the appellants contended that the facts established in evidence are sufficient to warrant the conclusion that his clients have occupancy right in the lands. The first circumstance relied on for this purpose is the payment of a uniform rate of rent. It is clear from a reference to Ex. T-1 that the present rate was fixed in 1866. We may therefore take it that for 47 years the same rate was continuously paid to the hukdar. I do not accept the learned vakil's contention that it was only a nominal rent that was paid. It was in the year 1868 that commutation from waram was made regarding the rate of rent. The sum of Rs. 2-7-0 per acre of nanja paid to the landlord after deducting the sircar kist cannot be regarded as a low rate. The next circumstance relied on was continuity of possession. There is evidence on the side of the hukdar, which is to some extent specific, showing that the cultivators were changed from time to time. The District Judge has expressed no opinion upon this evidence, and I do not desire to base my judgment upon that deposition. But having regard to the usual mamool in this country of not changing a cultivator unless it be under very exceptional circumstances, I am not prepared to attach much weight to this contention. In the southern parts of this Presidency instances can be cited of persons cultivating the same land for generations.

This is largely due to the feeling on the part of the proprietor that it is a sin to turn a cultivator out of the field which he has ploughed and enriched, and to the feeling and veneration which the latter entertains for his master. I am averse to basing any conclusion regarding rights in the soil upon continuous possession, even granting that the contention of the appellant is well founded. I must also point out that no attempt has been made in the Court below by the cultivators to prove that they, their fathers and their grandfathers have been continuously in occupation of the same land for any length of time. The next circumstance relied on was that the cultivators have been alienating the lands as if they were the owners thereof.

The District Judge points out that it has not been shown that any of those alienations were made to the knowledge of the hukdar. Mr. Narasimha Aiyangar has drawn our attention to one single instance in which the hukdar's kariasthan is said to have written the deed of mortgage. This is not enough to bring home to the hukdar the fact that the cultivaters were dealing with the property as if they were the proprietors. Moreover most of these transactions are of a very recent date, and I do not think they are of any consequence in determining the rights of the parties. There is no doubt of the fact that some of the tenants did succeed in obtaining a decision in their favour establishing their occupancy right. In the pre ent case no attempt has bsen made to show that any of the appellants derived title under these cultivators. Therefore the plea of res judicata is not available to them. Nonetheless those judgments are evidence of the right now put forward. But their probative value is not much as the judgment of Mr. Goldie solely proceeded upon possession for 20 or 30 years, a fact which the Judicial Committee in Mayandi Chettiyar v. Chokkalingam Pillay (10) and the High Court in recent cases have held to be insufficient to prove occupancy right. On the other side Mr. Venkatarama Sastriar referred us to the fact that a majority of the cultivators accepted the position of tenants-at-will by executing muchilikas. He also referred us to certain compensation proceedings of 1868, in which the right of the hukdar was accepted by the Government to the total exclusion of the cultivators: see evidence of P. W. 8. Both the learned vakils relied upon the use of the word "swamibogam" in support of their contentions. It is true that the expression denotes that the person receiving it is the owner and proprietor of the land. Wilson in his glossary gives this as the correct rendering of the expression. On the other hand Mr. Hodgson seemed inclined to the view that the expression connoted that the cultivators had an interest in the land: see Fifth Report, Vol. 3 p. 346. To sum up, the factsin favour of the appellants are:

(a) Payment of a uniform rate of rent for nearly 50 years; (b) an alleged continuous occupation from father tc son for the same period; (c) alienation of the property in their possession without the knowledge or consent of the hukdar during recent years; (d) two judgments on two different occasions in their favour establishing occupancy right after contest. The circumstances against their contentions are: (1) the majority of cultivators in the village have agreed to hold their lands as tenants-at-will; (2) in a previous land acquisition proceeding some of the tenants did not set up a right of occupancy; and (3) they are cultivators under riyatwari patta holders. I have held as regards (a) that the rent paid is not insignificant; as regards (b) I am not satisfied that there has been continuous occupation from father to son; as regsrds (c) no weight can be attached to it as the transactions were behind the back of the hukdar; as regards (d) it cannot be disputed that the judgment of Mr. Goldie, if it comes up for consideration before the High Court today, will not be upheld on the grouuds mentioned by him. As regards the judgment of the District Munsif he was largely influnced by the judgment of Mr. Goldie and had referred to a few other circumstances which do not advance the case of the tenants any further. The circumstances referred to us being against them detract very much from the value to be attached to the points established in their favour. My decision would therefore largely depend upon the view I take as to onus of proof in this case. If I come to the conclusion that the burden is upon the cultivators to establish their right of occupancy, I shall have no hesitation to decide that they have failed to discharge it. If, on the other hand, I hold that it is for the hukdar to show th t he has the sole proprietary right, I would hesitate before holding that they have proved their case.

Therefore it becomes necessary to consider the question of the burden of proof. In order to come to a proper conclusion on this point it is necessary to consider the nature of the right which a raiytawari pattadar has in the soil. Contemporaneous with the permanent settlement under Regn. 25 of 1802, the question was considered on what basis the remaining land should be settled. There were a number of conflicting views. Some revenue officials recommended the Mutta system, that is a system by which a number of villages were intended to be granted to a single owner making him responsible for the Government assessment. Others were in favour of the village system, by which it was expected that each village would be handed over to the headman or some respectable person in the village who would parcel out the lands to the cultivators and would also be responsible to the Government for kist. And lastly, there were others who advocated the raiyatwari system by which it was intended that small holdings should be allotted to a large number of persons. Sir Thomas Munro was a strong advocate of the raiyatwari settlement. In the Ceded Districts, to which he was appointed Principal Collector after the war with Tippu, he tried the experiment and succeeded beyond expectation in showing that both the raiyats and the Government were benefited by the raiyatwari system. Although the Government of the day recognized the success of the experiment in these districts, they were not prepared to give effect to it in the other districts. In a letter addressed to Sir George Barlow, the then Governor of Madras, by the Board of Revenue, the Board while remarking that pointed out that what was achieved by Colonel Munro in the Ceded Districts could not be expected of other officers in the other districts and that the system was fraught with danger to Government revenue. This letter was signed by Mr. Hodgson as a member of the Board of Revenue. Thereupon the Governor-in-Council accepted the recommendation of the Board, and ruled that the raiyatwari system should not be introduced in the other districts. Meanwhile Sir Thomas Munro went to England, and was invited to give evidence before a Select Committee of the House of Commons on 15th April 1812. He strongly advocated the Ryotwari settlement. This is what he said in his evidence:

"Every Raiyat, who is likewise a cultivating proprietor of the land which he holds, is permitted to hold that land at a fixed assessment as long as he pleases; he holds it for ever without any additional assessment. If he occupies any waste or additional land, he pays the assessment that is fixed upon that land and no more; his rent undergoes no alteration."

Apparently his view prevailed, as we find that the Court of Directors agreed to introduce the raiyatwari settlement in Madras. On 16th December 1812, the Court wrote:

"It remains for us to signify our directions that in all the provinces that may be unsettled when this despatch shall reach you, the principle of the raiyatwari system, as it is termed, shall be acted upon, and that where village rents upon any other principle shall have been established, the leases shall be declared to be terminable at the expiration of the period for which they may have been granted."

The next question that I propose to consider is, what was the nature of the right that was secured by the raiyatwari system. I have already referred to the evidence of Sir Thomas Munro before the Select Committee. In one of his minutes dated 15th August 1807 this is what he says about the raiyatwari system:

"That it is better adapted to preserve simplicity of manner and good order, because every raiyat will, on his own estate, be at once proprietor, farmer and labourer; because the division of property by engaging men in labour for their maintenance is favourable to quiet."

Baden Powell in his Land System of British India gives this definition of the raiyatwari system:

"A system of land revenue administration in which there is no middleman or landlord over the individual raiyats who are severally liable for the land revenue assessment on the holding."

Again, quoting from the Settlement Manual for Madras he describes the raiyatwari system thus, Vol. 3, p. 130:

"Under the raiyatwari system every registered holder of land is recognized as its proprietor. He is at liberty to sublet his property or to transfer it by gift, sale or mortgage. He cannot be ejected by Government, so long as he pays the fixed assessment, and has the option of diminishing his holding or of entirely abandoning it. The raiyat under this system is virtually a proprietor on a simple and perfect title, and has all the benefits of a perfect lease without its responsibilities."

It is clear from the extracts which I have quoted that the settlement by the Government under the raiyatwari system was with the actual cultivator of the soil whereas in settlements under Regn. 25 of 1802, the proprietor had only the right to receive rent from persons who were in occupation of the lands. Of course there are cases under the raiyatwari system in which certain classes of the community who are not in the habit of tilling the soil have been given a raiyatwari patta. But in such cases a pattadar is the undoubted proprietor of the land with liberty to get it cultivated by leasing it to cultivators. This being the history of the system and the incidents of the system being what I have already described them to be, it seems to me that if a person claims to have acquired occupancy right under a raiyatwari holder, the burden lies heavily upon him to establish it. One other aspect of the question will also lead to the same conclusion. Under Madras Act 2 of 1894 the land for which the Patta is given is held liable for the payment of revenue. If the patta-holder makes default in paying the revenue, the holding can be sold irrespective of the fact that cultivators are on the soil for generations together. There can be no question that the rights of these cultivators would be swept away by the sale for arrears of revenue. This is an indication that the Legislature and the Government of the country do not recognize a permanent occupancy right in the soil under a raiyatwari pattadar.

It is not easy to say what would be the residue of interest that would be left to the raiyatwari pattadar, if he has the Governmeut above him who can sell the lands under the patta straightaway for arrears and if he must recognize an occupancy raiyat under him whose interest in the soil must be very considerable. The conception is opposed to the recommendations of those who advocated the raiyatwari system. Virtually the occupancy raiyat in a raiyatwari village deprives the pattadar of all rights save that of being the recipient of a permanent rent.

Before dealing with the cases which have been quoted at the Bar, I shall refer very briefly to the history of the raiyatwari settlement in the Tinnevelly District. Contemporaneous with Sir Thomas Munro in the Ceded Districts Mr. Hodgson was apparently the Collector of Tinnevelly. As I pointed out before, he was very much against the raiyatwari system. Sir Thomas Munro had induced the Court of Directors to accept his view in preference to the view of the Board of Revenue; subsequently when he was appointed to the Governorship of the Presidency, he directed that the raiyatwari system should be introduced in all the districts. So far as Tinnevelly was concerned, we are told attempts were made to introduce this system from 1827 onwards. By the year 1834 it was introduced in a number of villages (vide the Tinnevelly Gazetteer). But apparently no further progress was made for sometime. It was in the year 1861 when Mr. Puchle was the Collector, the Government of the day decided that the district should be surveyed and that the raiyatwari tenure should be introduced at once. From the fact that in 1842 a raiyatwari patta was given to the temple, we may take it that this was one of the villages upon which the principle was experimented between the years 1827 and 1834. In all probability the predecessors-intitle of Vengu Mudaliar were themselves cultivators of the lands when they were sold to the temple. There is nothing in the history of the system as applied to the Tinnevelly District to lead to the conclusion that, prior to the acquisition of the property by the temple, the present cultivators had acquired any interest in the lands. That being in short the position of the raiyatwari pattadar in the district, it seems to me that no special considerations arise in dealing with the lands situated in Tinnevelly different from those which would apply to lands in Tanjore or Trichinopoly. At any rate there is nothing on the record in this case to lead me to hold that the Tinnevelly cultivator should be treated differently from the cultivator in the other districts of the southern part of the Presidency.

The facts referred to above establish at least this much, that at the time when five-sixths of the lands were sold for arrears of revenue to Vengu Mudaliar the interest of the cultivators, if any, ceased to exist. Consequently it is clear that they had no subsisting rights when the Mudaliar acquired the property for the temple. Secondly when the Collector in 1842 directed that raiyatwari patta should be granted to the hukdar, he must have had before him the instructions of the Madras Government contained in the Settlement Manual and in the minute of Sir Thomas Munro. The inference is that at this time persons who were cultivating the soil had no occupancy right in it. It follows from the above two conclusions that the present cultivators must have been let into possession either by Vengu Mudaliar or by his descendants Mr. Goldie in the judgment already referred to speaks of 20 or 30 years' possession in 1864. This lends support to my view that the appellants' predecessors probably came in as cultivators after the issue of the raiyatwari patta to the hukdars of the temple. Their occupation was not immemorial as was suggested in the course of the arguments in these appeals.

Now I proceed to consider the decisions that have been quoted. Most of these decisions have been reviewed fully in the judgment which the learned Chief Justice delivered in Muna Muhammad Rowther v. Muthu Alagappa Chettiar (3) Therefore I shall not attempt to deal with every one of them. A few of them, however require consideration in the light of the history of the raiyatwari settlement which I have sketched above. Krishnasami Pillai v. Varadaraja Ayyangar (11) was a decision of the Full Bench and in view of the fact that Muthuswami Aiyar, J., who took part in Chidambara Pillai v. Thiruvengadathiengar (1) was also a party to this decision, it should be considered with some care. Sir Charles Turner, with whose judgment Muthuswami Aiyar, J., concurred, says at p. 357:

"Without attempting to define what period of occupation should confer a right of occupancy —a matter which can be only dealt with by the Legislature—we consider ourselves at liberty to say that an occupation for upwards of 70 years is sufficient, under the circumstances of this case, to throw upon those who seek to disturb it the burden of showing that the tenancy was not accompanied with a right of occupancy and that the plaintiff has not succeeded in doing so."

This passage shows that the learned Chief Justice laid the burden in the first instance upon persons who asserted the right of occupancy, but that in his opinion the facts proved in that case shifted the burden on to the pattadar. In the judgment of Kindersley, J., the facts are fully set out and I find that there was a previous litigation in which the right of the tenants to remain on the lands so long as they paid rent regularly was upheld. The learned Chief Justice refers to a number of documents which according to the evidence, constitute an engagement not to eject the tenants from their holdings. It is true that there are observations in the judgment tending to show that a cultivating raiyat is entitled to some interest in the soil. In p. 357 reference is made to the custom of the country and of the district. No such custom has been sought to be established in this case and I, therefore do not think that this decision, which proceeded upon the special features of that case and which did not in the first instance throw the burden upon the proprietor is an authority for the proposition contended for by Mr. Narasimha Aiyangar. That this is the correct interpretation of the decision is clear from a reference to Chidambara Pillai v. Thiruvengadathiengar (1), to which Muthuswami Aiyar, J., was a party. In that case the law is laid down in these terms:

"The claim of an occupancy right as overriding the proprietor's right to cultivate his own land is of a special character, and as such it is one which the party, seeking to derogate from the ordinary incidents of property is bound to establish. . . . Mere length of enjoyment in the capacity of tenants or purakudies irrespective of other circumstances is not prima facie proof of occupancy right."

I have shown already what the incidents of a raiyatwari tenure are, and the judgment in Chidambara Pillai v. Thiruvengadathiengar (1) entirely supports the view I have taken. When we remember that Muthuswami Aiyar, J., was first a Deputy Collector, and afterwards an Inam Commissioner, the value of his pronouncement acquires very great weight. This view of the burden of proof was accepted unreservedly by Shephard and Subramania Ayyar, JJ., in Cheekati Zamindar v. Ranasooru Dhora (12). In Rangasami Reddi v. Gnana Sammantha Pandara Sannadhi (13) Subramania Aiyar, J., and Moore, J., acted on that view. Moore, J., quotes the passage which I have already cited and accept it as good law. Sadasiva Aiyar, J., and Napier, J., in Naina Pillai v. Ramanathan Chettiar (14) have examined the case law very fully and have accepted the conclusions stated in Chidambara Pillai v. Thiruvengadathiengar (1). We have a very full discussion by the learned Chief Justice and Sadasiva Aiyar, J., in Muna Muhammad Rowther v. Muthu Alagappa Chettiar (3), wherein the principle enunciated in Chidambara Pillai v. Thiruvengadathiengar (1) is accepted and restated. As against these decisions Mr. Narasimha Aiyangar quoted Peria Karuppan v. Annasawmi Iyer (8), Venkatachala Goundan v. Rangaratnam Aiyar (9) and Chandrasekharaswami v. Nainar Ammal (15). As regards Peria Karuppan v. Annasawmi Iyer (8) it is enough to say that the proposition therein laid down is not disputed by those who allege that the burden of proof is upon the person claiming occupancy right. What the learned Judges say is that it should not be laid down that in all cases of raiyatwari lands a cultivating tenant cannot have a right of occupancy in the lands.

This contention is not advanced now. It is no doubt an anomalous position. But it is easy to conceive of a grant of occupancy right which is only in other words a permanent lease by a raiyatwari holder in favour of a cultivator. Such leases are very common in South Kanara. It is also imaginable that the limited right of holding the land on payment of a fixed rate of rent with the incidents of occupancy right may be acquired by a cultivator Therefore it is not necessary to say that under no circumstances can an occupancy right be acquired against the raiyatwari proprietor. Therefore the proposition which is stated in Peria Karuppan v. Annasawmi Iyer (8) seems to be exceptional as far as it goes. It is in Venkatachala Goundan v. Rangaratnam Aiyar (9) that a further extension seems to have been attempted. In this latter case the learned Judges, quoting without disapproval the dictum of Muthuswami Aiyar, J., in Chidambara Pillai v. Thiruvengadathiengar (1) and also the statement of law contained in Rangasami Reddi v. Gnana Sammantha Pandara Sannadhi (13) and Cheekati Zamindar v. Ranasooru Dhora (12). say:

"There is nothing in the observations above cited to warrant the opinion that in the case of every raiyatwari village there is necessarily a presumption that a raiyat holding under a mirasidar has no occupancy right."

If the judgment stood there, no exception can be taken to it. But almost towards the end the learned Judges seem inclined to hold that the burden is upon the proprietor to show that a cultivator who has been long on the land has not acquired a right of occupancy. It seems to me that this proposition is not warranted by the decisions which the learned Judges have quoted without dissent in the body of their judgment. I will not examine this case any further, as we were told that it is under appeal to the Privy Council. Now I come to the last case quoted before us, Chandrasekharaswami v. Nainar Ammal (15). There are two statements in it; one is that the second appellate Court is bound by the findings of fact on the question of occupancy right at which the District Judge has arrived. If the judgment has been based upon that view of the functions of the second appellate Court, no exception could be taken to the conclusion arrived at in this case. But the learned Judges also proceed to lay down the principles upon which the case should be decided. I cannot help observing that in the body of the judgment the use of the words tenant and landlord, which is the very fact to be established by the evidence, has to some extent clouded the issue to be decided. The expressions tenant and landlord have special meanings assigned to them in our legislative enactments. One feels, on reading the decision as if the principle applicable to cases under the Estates Land Act had been unconsciously adopted in the disposal of the case. No doubt Chandrasekharaswami v. Nainar Ammal (15) is based upon Peria Karuppan v. Annasawmi Iyer (8) and Venkatachala Goundan v. Rangaratnam Aiyar (9). I have stated my opinion about these two decisions. With all respect I am not prepared to accept the principle as to the onus enunciated in Chandrasekharaswami v. Nainar Ammal (15). I prefer to follow the view taken by Collins, C. J., Muthuswami Aiyar, J., Shephard, J., Subramania Aiyar, J., Sadasiva Aiyar, J., Napier, J., as well as by the learned Chief Justice. In my opinion the burden is upon the cultivators to show that they have got an occupancy right in these raiyatwari lands which have been taken up by Government under the Land Acquisition Act and the evidence they have let in is not sufficient to discharge that burden. I therefore agree with the District Judge that they are not entitled to compensation on the footing of being occupancy tenants. At the same time I think that in respect of their interest in the land as tenants from year to year, they are entitled to have their share of the compensation apportioned, and we fix it at one anna in the rupee. Subject to this modification, we dismiss the appeals with costs. The vakil's fee will be Rs. 352 in all the appeals together.

Nungambakkam Andalammal—Plaintiff—Opposite Party.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 2 of 1918, Decided on 24th September 1918, from the judgment and order of Sm. C. C. Chief Judge in F. B. Appln. No. 77 of 1917, in Suit No 3295 of 1917.

* Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 12—Suit by vendor for recovery of consideration, expressing readiness to execute conveyance, is in effect one for specific performance of contract—Form of decree to be passed in such suit indicated.

Ordinarily a suit will not lie for the specific performance of a contract to pay money. But the case of a vendor is an exception to the rule and the Court will grant the vendor specific performance of his contract against the purchaser. Where the plaint. in a suit by a vendor for recovery of the unpaid sale consideration, expresses the plaintiff's willingness to perform his part of the contract and execute a conveyance, the suit is, in effect, one for specific performance and is not cognizable by a Small Cause Court. The fact that the contract between the parties stipulated for payment by the vendee first and execution of the conveyance by the vendor afterwards will not make any difference. [P 304 C 1]

The form of the decree in such a suit is that the plaintiff is to be at liberty to prepare and execute a conveyance to the defendant as an escrow to be delivered to the defendant on payment of the purchase money within the time limited and that the defendant is to pay the purchase money after the conveyance is ready. Where however the contract is that the vendee should pay the purchase money first and the vendor should execute the conveyance afterwards the proper decree would be a direction that the defendant should pay followed by a direction that the conveyance should be executed after payment.

Wallis, C. J.—This is an application to revise a decision of the Full Bench of the Court of Small Causes, Madras, which came before me yesterday and was referred to a Bench. It raises the question whether the plaint discloses a suit for specific performance of a contract to sell land. If it lies, then admittedly the Court of Small Causes had no jurisdiction. Ordinarily of course, a suit will not lie for specific performance of a contract to pay money. But the case of the vendor, as pointed out in Fry's Specific Performance, p. 33, is an exception to that rule, and the Court will grant the vendor specific performance of his contract against the purchaser; and the form of the decree in such a case will be found in Morgan v. Briscoe (1) and is set out in Seton's Judgments and Orders, Vol. 3, pp. 2174 and 2175. The form is that the plaintiff is to be at liberty to prepare and execute a conveyance to the defendant as an escrow to be delivered to the defendant on payment of the purchase money within the time limited, and that the defendant is to pay the purchase money after the conveyance is ready. It was stated that there was a difficulty about this in India, as under the Stamp Act the money for the purchase of stamp has to be found by the vendee. But this presents no real difficulty as the duty may be paid by the vendor added to the purchase money which the vendee has to pay under the decree.

That being so we have to look at this plaint, and see whether it is framed so as to disclose a suit for specific performance. In the passage cited to us in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 27, p. 83, it is stated that the vendor in a suit for specific performance must declare that he is ready and willing to execute a conveyance. In para. 3 of the plaint, the plaintiff recites a contract by which the defendant bound himself to pay the sum therein mentioned as soon as the High Court of Madras reopened after the summer vacation in July 1914, the plaintiff on her part undertaking to reconvey the said properties to this defendant by executing a conveyance in his favour and getting it registered. Para. 5 of the plaint says that the plaintiff avers that she is even now ready and willing to perform her part of the contract. Although the prayer only asks for the payment of Rs. 301-13-0, taking the plaint as a whole with the averment that the plaintiff is ready and willing to perform her part of the contract, I think it must be taken as a prayer for specific performance. That is sufficient to dispose of the present case.

The question has been argued before us whether, supposing the contract between the parties stipulated for payment by the vendee first and execution of the conveyance by the vendor afterwards, that would make any difference. I am disposed to think it would not, and that the plaint would still be for specific performance of the contract, and the proper decree in such a case would be a direction that the defendant should pay, followed by a direction in the decree that the conveyance should be executed after payment. The distinction, it seems to me, is whether the suit is to be regarded as a suit for money payable under the contract, in which case it is strictly a suit for specific performance, or as a suit for damages. As I read the plaint, I think it is clear that the plaintiff has prayed for specific performance and therefore the petition must be allowed and the decree of the Small Cause Court set aside and the plaint returned for presentation to the proper Court. Costs to abide.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—I agree. The law as stated in Fry's Specific Performance at p. 34 is:

"It is well established that the remedy is mutual, and that the vendor may bring his action in all cases where the purchaser could sue for specific performance of the contract."

The question in this case is whether the plaint is substantially one for specific performance. If there were no contract between the parties and if their relations were regulated by S. 55, T. P. Act, there can be no doubt that the plaintiff will not be entitled to any money, and the suit will be regarded as premature, if there was no offer for executing a conveyance. It was suggested that under the terms of the contract there was a right to get money prior to the execution of the document and that the liability to execute the conveyance was to follow some time after. I have asked the translator to translate the document once again, and I am satisfied that the right to the money and the right to the conveyance are practically contemporaneous. The word "thodanai" suggests that the execution of the conveyance is to follow immediately on the payment of the money and therefore this was a case of a mutual and dependent contract. The right to the money would not accrue unless the other party is ready and willing to execute a conveyance. In that view of the document, it seems to me that we must put a reasonable construction on the plaint in this case. If it is to be regarded not as a suit for specific performance, the suit is liable to be dismissed on the ground that there is no present right to the money. We have also to see whether the averments in the plaint are such as to enable us to regard the suit as one for specific performance. As my Lord has pointed out, there is an offer to execute a conveyance, and the document also says that other conveyances in respect of other portions of the property have already been executed. Therefore it seems to me that what the plaintiff wanted was that he should get his money on his executing a conveyance. That, as pointed out by the learned Chief Justice, is really a suit for specific performance, and as such the Small Cause Court has no jurisdiction. I entirely agree with the order as regards the return of the plaint to the proper Court.

Second Appeal No. 111 of 1916, Decided on 9th December 1918, against the decree of Sub-Judge, Tanjore, in Original Suit No. 18 of 1914.

(a) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), O. 32, R. 7—Endorsement of Court on petition of compromise is sufficient—Civil P. C. (14 of 1882), S. 462.

An order of Court sanctioning a compromise on behalf of a minor party need not on the face of it state in so many words that the Court has considered the terms of the settlement and has come to the conclusion that the settlement is in the interests of the minor.

An endorsment of Court on the petition to sanction the compromise, which sets forth that the compromise is in the minor's interests, to the effect that the petition is granted is a sufficient compliance with the provisions of S. 462, Civil P. C. of 1882: 17 All. 531, Expl.

(b) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), O. 32, R. 7 — Compromise binding—Trial of question forming subject-matter of compromise is barred.

(c) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), O. 32, R. 7 —Arrangement sanctioned by Court—Provisions not embodied in decree can be enforced against minor.

If a Court sanctions an arrangement but some of its provisions cannot be embodied in the decree because they do not relate to the suit, those provisions can be enforced against the minors though not by way of execution of the compromise decree. [P 310 C 1]

K. Srinivasa Aiyangar and A. Krishnasamy Aiyar—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—The real question for consideration is as to the binding character of the compromise proceedings which resulted in the decree Ex. 10 and whether the conveyances Exs. A, A-1 and B are valid transactions. The compromise was effected in a suit instituted to enforce a mortgage against defendant 1 in this suit and his sons, the present plaintiff and defendants 2 to 5, who were at that time minors, being represented by their grandmother as guardian ad litem. That suit was Original Suit No. 29 of 1899. The main defence to the suit was that the mortgage was not binding on the minor defendants inasmuch as the debts for which the mortgage was executed had been incurred by their father for immoral and illegal purposes. A written statement was filed and issues were framed. The minor defendants were represented by a very respectable pleader of the Kumbakonam Subordinate Judge's Court. While the suit was pending, the parties came to an amicable arrangement and a compromise was effected Ex. 8 is the petition of compromise and along with it was filed a razinamah Ex. 9. A decree, Ex. 10, was passed in accordance with that razinamah. The petition sets out the nature of the suit and the defence, and states that, on an examination made of the accounts with the aid of the minors' relations, and in the light of the investigations made, it was found that the amount mentioned in the hypothecation bond sued upon had been borrowed and spent by defendant 1, i. e., the father, for the benefit of the family and for family purposes. Then it says that it had been settled through mediators that a sum of Rs. 56,500 should be paid by the defendants to the piaintiffs in full satisfaction of the latter's claim. Para. 5 states that in had been arranged by the mediators that for this sum of Rs. 56,500 a sale deed for Rs. 52,500 was to be executed in favour of the plaintiffs by defendent 1 and by the guardian ad litem of the minors on behalf of the minors in respect of the lands in the hypotheceted village, that an indemnity bond should also be executed with respect to the lands of one of the villages and that the defendants should pay to the plaintiffs within 1st March 1901 the belance of Rs. 4,000 with interest. The next paragraph says that "the said arrangement is most favourable to the said minors' interest and benefit", and the Court is asked

"to accept the razinamah presented herewith whereby a compromise for Rs. 56,500 has been made as aforesaid with the plaintiffs by me on behalf of defendants 2 to 4."

It is signed by Lakshmi Ammal, the guardian ad litem of the minor defendants. The razinamah referred to embodies all the terms of Ex. 8, excepting what is provided in para. 5 as to the sale of the villages for Rs. 52,500. What it says is that:

"Rs. 56,500 is to be paid in full satisfaction of the claims of the plaintiffs in that suit, and out of this amount, Rs. 52,500 (the amount mentioned in Ex. 8 as the price of the villages sold) is to be paid within 2nd March next and the defendants shall pay to plaintiff 1 within 1st March 1901 the belance amount of Rs. 4,000."

The razinamah is signed both by Lakshmi Ammal and by defendant 1. Both these documents are dated 28th February 1900. and were filed on the same day in the Subordinate Judge's Court. On Ex. 8 the order passed is "granted" bearing date 28th February, and on Ex. 9 the order is "decreed accordingly." The decree is drawn up in the terms of the razinamah and is also dated 28th February 1900. In pursuance of these deocuments Ex. A was executed both by defendant 1 T. S. Subbarama Iyer and Lakshmi Ammal, the guardian of the minors, on 2nd March 1900 with respect to some villages mentioned in Ex. 8. Ex. B is another sale deed with respect to the remaining lands also executed on 2nd March by the same parties. Both these documents refer to the settlement arrived at between the parties by the razinamah and the decree passed in accordance with the razinamah. The first argument advanced by the learned Advocate-General who appeared for the plaintiff-appellant is that the compromise is ineffective inasmuch as no leave of the Court was obtained. This argument is merely based on a criticizm of the words in the last paragraph of Ex. 8, that is, "the Court will be pleased to accept the razinamah presented herewith". It is suggested that this only meant that the Court was to file the razinamah, not that the Court was asked to apply its mind to the terms of the razinamah in order to see whether they were for the benefit of the minors or not. I think this is merely quarrelling with words. The petition sets out S. 462 Civil P. C., which provided for compromise of suits on behalf of minors. It states that the arrangement is "most favourable to the minors and for their benefit". There can be no doubt that the parties intended to ask the Court to give leave for compromise as required by S. 462 of the old Code. The petition is signed by the guardian ad litem of the minors and the order made is "granted." That can only mean that the Court sanctioned the compromise as being for the benefit of the minors.

The learned Advocate-General next argues that the order itself must show that the Court did, as a matter of fact, applied its mind to the terms of the arrangement and was satisfied that the arrangement was for the benefit of the minors. S. 462 does not require that the order of the Court granting leave should be expressed in any particular form. What it says is that "any agreement or compromise entered into without the leave of the Court shall be voidable against all parties other than the minors."

No doubt the Court in granting the leave has to consider whether the arrangement or compromise is such as can be said to be for the benefit of the minor, but I do not think that the law requires that the order of the Court should, on the face of it, state in so many words that the Court considered the terms of the settlement, and come to the conclusion that the settlement was in the interests of the minor. The question was before the Privy Council in three of the cases that have been brought to our notice, first in Manohar Lal v. Jadunath Singh (1). There the compromise was held to be bad as, upon the facts, their Lordships found that leave of the Court had not been obtained as required by law. There was no such petition in that case, as there is here, expressed to be under S. 462. The petition for leave in this case bears the signature of the pleaders appearing for the minors, which is always some guarantee that the requirements of the law have been complied with, and there was no evidence in the Privy Council case, as there is here, that the matter was brought to the notice of the Court and the terms of the settlement explained to it.

All that their Lordships laid down was that it must be shown that leave of the Court was obtained either by an order of the Court or in some other way not open to doubt. In Ganesha Row v. Tulja Ram Row (2) the principle enunciated in Manohar Lal v. Jadunath Singh (1) was confirmed. In Subramanian Chettiar v. Rajeswara Dorai (3) their Lordships refer to the above decisions and confirm the proposition previously laid down by them. If the law were, as contended by the learned Advocate-General, that the order of the Court must contain within its four corners a statement that the Court that considered the terms of the settlement had come to the conclusion that they were for the benefit of the minor, their Lordships would, in all likelihood, have so laid it down. We have however been referred by the learned Advocate-General to a decision of the Allahabad High Court in Kalavati v. Chedi Lal (4). No doubt, the learned Judges there did say that the Court sanctioning a compromise or giving leave ought to make it clear in the order itself that it had considered whether the compromise was beneficial to the minor. No doubt, the Court ought not to leave a matter of this sort in doubt. But it is a very different thing from saying that, if particular forms of expression are wanting in the order although it is proved otherwise that the matter was fully brought to the notice of the Court and the Court granted leave having before it all the considerations, that the compromise must fail on that account. That this is not the law is just what has been pointed out by Jenkins, C. J., in Virupakshappa v. Shidappa (5). It may be mentioned, as has been pointed out before, that the new Code has used somewhat different language with respect to this matter. It requires by O. 32, R. 7, that leave of the Court should be expressly recorded in the proceedings. But this is an alteration of a minor character and here at at all events we have got an order in writing. I have therefore no hesitation in finding that leave of the Court had been properly obtained as required by the law.

The next contention of the appellant was to the effect that what had been sanctioned by the Court was only the arrangement contained in the razinamah Ex. 9 and the decree following upon the razinamah. But this is not, to my mind, a correct interpretation of the order of the Court. The provision regarding sale in para. 5 of the petition was an essential part of the agreement by which the suit was compromised. That was placed before the Court, and the evidence of the pleader who appeared for the minors shows that the terms were properly and fully explained to the Court. He is a leading practitioner of considerable position and the learned Subordinate Judge entirely believed his evidence and nothing has been urged by the learned Advocate-General to throw doubt on it. In fact he did not make any such attempt. According to that evidence the whole of the arrangement was brought to the notice of the Court, and it will not be right to presume that the Court wanted to sanction only a part of that arrangement. The entire argument of the appellant is based on the wording of the latter part of para. 6, where it is prayed that the Court might be pleased "to accept the razinamah presented herewith" but this leaves out of account the previous sentences in the same paragraph that "the said arrangement is most favourable to the said minors' interest and benefit," referring to para. 5 containing the provision for sale as well as to the preceding paragraphs. I trust it was the entire arrangement which the Court was asked to approve as being beneficial to the minors.

So far as I have followed the argument of the learned Advocate-General he has not been able to suggest any plausible reason why the parties entering into an arrangement like this should have asked for the sanction of the Court for only a portion of it. It is perfectly true however that the razinamah was presented along with the petition and the Court was asked to pass a decree in accordance with the razinamah, and neither the razinamah nor the decree contains the stipulation as to the sale of the properties. But that to my mind is easily explained by the practice of the Courts with reference to such matters as it obtained at the time in this presidency. It had been ruled in Venkatappa Nayanim v. Thimma Nayanim (6) and Muthu Vijaya Raghunatha Udayana Tevar v. Thandavaraya Tambiran (7) that the relief given by a compromise decree should be the same as that claimed in the plaint or less and that any terms which do not come strictly within the scope of the suit could not be embodied in the decree. There can be no doubt that the practice of the Courts in this Presidency was in accordance with these rulings. In Venkatappa Nayanim v. Thimma Nayanim (6) the learned Judges laid down:

> "It seems reasonable to hold that the words 'so far as it relates to the suit' in S. 375 must be restricted to relief which the Court could have given in the suit and will not embrace reliefs which could only have been given in a suit based upon a different cause of action."

In a more recent decision however in Natesan Chetty v. Vengu Nachiar (8), following Joti Kuruvetappa v. Izari Sirusappa (9), this view of the law has been dissented from. But that was long after the date of these transactions which took place in 1899 and 1900. The frame of the three documents Exs. 8, 9 and 10 clearly shows that the Court and the legal advisers of the parties were fully conscious of the law as it stood at the time. It was for that reason that while the petition stated the terms of the compromise the razinamah left out the provision for sale, for it was apparently thought that such a provision could not properly go into the decree according to the abovementioned ruling in Venkatappa Nayanim v. Thimma Nayanim (6). At the same time the razinamah as well as the decree cannot be properly understood without reference to para. 5 of the petition for according to the razinamah as well as the decree Rs. 52,500 was to be paid within 2nd March by which time the parties contemplated to complete the compromise by the execution of proper conveyances as provided in para. 5 of the petition Ex. 8. It may also be pointed out here that this point was never raised in the lower Court; it is not suggested in the plaint no issue was framed with respect to it and the judgment which is an extremely lengthy one does not mention it. The learned Advocate-General argues that this is a question of law and therefore it does not make any difference whether it was raised in the lower Court or not. I do not think that it is a pure question of law. Whether the Court wanted to sanction the entire arrangement or only a part of it depends upon what transpired in Court at the time. Evidence would have been forthcoming as to what was stated to the Court in this connexion and whether this stipulation was brought to the notice of the Court and the Court wanted to sanction it or not. The pleader of the minor defendants in that suit was examined at great length and it was not suggested to him that the stipulation regarding the sale was not brought to the notice of the Court. I think there can be little doubt that this contention of the appellant is entirely unfounded.

The learned Advocate-General further urged that the petition Ex. 8, did not contain some material facts which if brought to the notice of the Court might have induced the Court not to grant leave. It is said that some portion of the debts, amounting to about Rs. 10,000 was borrowed by the minor defendants themselves. No doubt if that was so it ought to have been mentioned in Ex. 8. But that there was any such plea has not been proved. The written statement in suit, although apparently in the possession of the pleader of the present plaintiff, was not produced, and there is nothing to show that any such plea was put forward. Besides in the plaint in this case there is no allegation that any facts were suppressed or concealed from the Court. Then it was also argued that the appellant must be allowed to show, even if the compromise is a valid and binding one, that the debts, or some portion of them, were in fact incurred for immoral and illegal purposes. In my opinion this is an untenable proposition. If the compromise is binding, it operates as a bar to the trial of any questions forming the subject-matter of the compromise.

The next contention of the Advocate-General is that since the stipulation regarding the sale is not embodied in the decree the sale deeds Exs. A, A-1 and B, so far as they affected the shares of the then minors, are not valid. These deeds were executed by Lakshmi Ammal, the guardian ad litem of the minors, on their behalf as well as by their father, defendant 1 in the former suit. The contention of the appellant is first of all that Lakshmi Ammal as guardian ad litem had no authority to execute the conveyance. The question is entirely bare of authority; but so far as I am concerned, I have little hesitation in holding that the conveyances in pursuance of Ex. 8 are valid and binding transactions. It is not necessary to pronounce upon any general question as to how far, if at all, a guardian ad litem or next friend is empowered, in conducting litigation on behalf of a minor, to deal with any property of the minor, whether involved in the suit or not. Mr. A. Krishnasawmy Iyer, the learned vakil for some of the alienees, has cited the analogy of the rule of English law relating to the interpretation of the powers of executors, trustees or public bodies charged with certain duties for a general proposition that where the law requires or empowers a person to do a certain act, that person must be taken to be clothed with all the necessary incidental powers to perform that act. The duty of a guardian ad litem is not confined to the conduct of the defence in the suit, but also extends to execution proceedings in which the guardian continues to represent the minor.

The guardian at litem representing a minor in a suit is empowered with leave of the Court to compromise the suit and also to adjust the decree in execution proceedings; and it is urged that it may often happen that such a person could not discharge these duties properly if he was not empowered with the sanction of the Court to apply the property of the minor in carrying out a compromise or adjustment. It is not necessary to discuss the broad question in connexion with this case. Here the minors were sued upon a mortgage. With the sanction of the Court a compromise decree was passed for a certain amount and the property was made liable to be sold in pursuance of the decree. Instead of allowing the property to be sold by public auction, it was found beneficial to the minors' interests that a portion of the property should be sold to the mortgagees in satisfaction of their claim. A provision like this seems to me to be a matter quite within the scope of the suit and one which could be properly sanctioned by the Court. I am of opinion that where, as here, as a part of the agreement arrived at between the parties the guardian ad litem who represented the minor applies to the Court to sanction an arrangement by which the compromise decree is to be satisfied, e. g., by sale of some of the properties involved in the suit, and the Court finding the entire arrangement to be in the interests of the minor sanctions it, the provision for sale could be enforced. It was argued that the leave of the Court granted under S. 462 does not necessarily mean any more than that the Court thinks that the arrangement is for the benefit of the minor and that it is no concern of the Court to see whether the arrangement can be effectively carried out and if so, by whom.

But there can be no doubt upon the rulings of this Court, and this has not been disputed before us, that if the Court sanctioned an arrangement, but some of its provisions could not be embodied in the decree because they did not relate to the suit as ruled in Venkatappa Nayanim v. Thimma Nayanim (6), those provisions could be enforced against the minors, though not by way of execution of the compromise decree. The specific arrangement in this case was that the grandmother of the minors as guardian ad litem in this suit should convey some portion of the mortgaged properties to the mortgagees in satisfaction of the compromise decree. It seems to me that if such an arrangement be not within the competence of a guardian ad litem and the sanction of the Court accorded to it is to be of no effect, it might lead to very far-reaching results. The sale deeds can also be upheld on another ground. They were executed in accordance with the provisions of Ex. 18 not only by the guardian ad litem of the minor defendants in that suit but by defendant 1 their father. It is suggested by the learned Advocate-General that each of these two parties, i. e., the father and the minors through their guardian ad litem purported to deal with their respective shares.

But this suggestion is not at all justified by the terms of the documents. There is no mention in them of anyone's share in any village; each of the parties executing the documents clearly intended to deal with the entire property. That was the scope of the stipulation in para. 5 of Ex. 8 and that is the effect of the conveyances Ex. A, A-1 and B. That being so we may leave out of consideration the part played by Lakshmi Ammal, the guardian ad litem of the minor defendants, in joining in the conveyances. The debts were incurred for the purposes of the family, and in order to discharge those debts the father was competent to dispose of the family property. The mere fact that the minors joined in the deeds through a person who might or might not have had authority to represent them in the transaction cannot make any difference as to the effect to be given to the conveyances as the acts of the minor himself. This is amply supported by the ruling of the Judicial Committee in Gharibullah v. Khalak Singh (10). The facts of that case were essentially analogous to those of the present case. There a deed of mortgage was executed by the karta or manager of the family, one Khalak Singh, as well as by a person purporting to act as the guardian of his minor brother. Their Lordships held according to well established rulings, that there could be no guardian appointed under the Guardians and Wards Act for a minor member of a joint Hindu family and therefore the person purporting to act as guardian had no authority to represent the minor.

Nevertheless they held that the transaction was valid, inasmuch as the debts were incurred for family purposes and Khalak Singh, the managing member of the family, executed the document. There is a similar ruling of this Court in Surapa Raju v. Venkatyya (11) and though the case of Gharibullah v. Khalak Singh (10) was not brought to the notice of the learned Judges, they laid down practically the same proposition. I am unable to see how this case can be distinguished in substance from those rulings which are based on what seem to me to be obviously good reasons. The father of the present plaintiff was clearly entitled to dispose of the properties in order to discharge these debts, and because the mortgagees or purchasers thought it safer that the minors should also be represented through their guardian ad litem or anybody else, that cannot make any difference as to the validity of the act of the plaintiff's father. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal fails altogether and must be dismissed with costs. It may be mentioned that apart from the general defence, defendant 12 in the suit also relied upon limitation, as he was made a party after the period of limitation had expired. The learned Advocate-General did not press the case against him and did not challenge the dismissal of the suit so far as he was concerned. I may point out that the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge in this case is unduly prolix, covering 90 printed pages. It begins with verbatim copies of the pleadings, then sets out the issues and under each issue, states the contentions and arguments of the parties at great length. In dealing with the evidence, no attempt is made to concentrate attention upon such evidence as really throws light upon particular issues. Similarly with regard to the reported cases many passages are quoted at length although the observations bearing on the questions at issue could be compressed within much shorter compass. There is a great deal of repetition throughout the judgment, with the result that it has necessarily taken up much of the time of this Court in finding out the conclusions of the learned Judge and the reasons on which those conclusions are based. We take this occasion to point out the desirability on the part of the lower Court to endeavour to set out the facts of the case, the questions for decision and the reasons for their conclusions in a way which would be of help to the appellate Court in ascertaining without unnecessary difficulty how the case has been tried and how far the conclusions of the trial Court were justified.

Oldfield, J.—I have nothing to add to my learned brother's reasons for holding that no argument based on S. 462 of the previous Code has been made good. As regards the next point dealt with by him, viz., the capacity of Lakshmi Ammal to execute Ex. A as guardian ad litem, I am not prepared to adopt his reasons for his conclusion.

It is however unnecessary that I should deal with this point, because I am able to concur in his alternative ground of decision that the execution of Ex. A by T. S. Subbarama Iyer, the father of the plaintiff, was sufficient. In doing so, I desire only to refer to the actual language of Ex. A. The persons executing it are detailed as, firstly, T. S. Subbarama Iyer; then his sons, and their names are given with a statement that they are minors; then Lakshmi Ammal is mentioned as guardian for the said minors and again there is a reference to "Subbarama Iyer, for himself." It is unnecessary that I should follow my learned brother through his treatment of the authorities and his statement of the law on this point, with which I with great respect entirely agree. I only wish to observe that the reference in the document to Subbarama Iyer executing it for himself need not and cannot be, as the learned Advocate-General contended, read simply as meaning that he is executing in respect of his own share. Subbarama Iyer is referred to as executing for himself in order to distinguish his execution from that of Lakshmi Ammal, who is referred to as executing for the minors. The plaintiff's argument here entails that Subbarama Iyer did execute it for himself, firstly, as owner of his share and secondly, as the father of the minors; that is quite sufficient to support the conclusion in favour of the defendants, and there is no necessity whatever to restrict the interpretation of the words referred to as the plaintiff proposes. In these circumstances I concur in my learned brother's decision and also in his observations on the character of the lower Court's judgment. I may add that it seems to me regrettable that the lower Courts should think it necessary to set out the whole of the pleadings, as they usually do, in extenso in their judgments, especially where they are, as here, voluminous, in disregard of the fact that the parties usually think it necessary to print them as in fact has been done in this case.

(This appeal having been set down for being spoken to this day, the Court delivered the following judgment.)

Abdur Rahim, J.—I think the respondents who are represented by Mr. K.

Srinivasa Ayyengar and Mr. A. Krishnaswami Ayyar respectively should be allowed separate fees in this appeal. If they had not succeeded on the preliminary point, it is clear from the grounds of appeal that there would have to be separate arguments on behalf of the two sets of respondents. But Mr. K. Srinivasa Ayyangar has asked us also to apply R. 41 of the Appellate Side Rules (relating to practitioner's fees) to this case. It provides that:

"in cases of special difficulty or importance, the Judge or Bench disposing of an appeal or other matter may, on the application of a party, direct that (1) a higher fee than would ordinarily be admissible under those rules be allowed, (2) two sets of fees be allowed to a party who has engaged more than one advocate, vakil or attorney."

No doubt in this case three senior leading vakils of this Court have been engaged on the side of the respondents and the present rule regarding vakil's fees may be taken to be quite inadequate to meet the costs of respondents in respect of vakil's fees. But R. 41 is meant to apply only to exceptional cases, that is, cases of exceptional difficulty and importance and we are unable to hold that the present case is one of such a nature. It may be that the present rules in force regarding practitioner's fees are not in touch with the actual practice of the profession but that is a matter for the profession as well as the authorities to consider. So long as the rules prevail, we have to give effect to them even though their application in particular cases may work considerable hardship. All that I would order is one set of costs for respondent 8 and another set for respondents 9 and 12 to 14.

Oldfield, J.—I agree.

Second Appeal No. 680 of 1917, Decided on 24th July 1918, against decree of Sub-Judge, Madura, in Appeal Suit No. 26 of 1916.

(a) Madras Proprietary Estates Village Service Act (1894), Ss. 10, 11 and 15—Person appointed by proprietor not disqualified under S. 10 (1)—Appointment duly reported—Divisional Officer cannot act under S. 11.

Where a person appointed by the proprietor under S. 15, Madras Proprietary Estates Village Services Act of 1894, is not disqualified under any of the five heads (a) to (e), sub-S. (1), S. 10 of the Act, and the appointment has been duly reported to the Divisional Officer, the latter has no right to take action under S. 11 and exercise the power of making an appointment himself. [P 314 C 1]

(b) Madras Proprietary Estates Village Service Act (1894), S. 15 (3)—Divisional Officer is alone competent to make appointment where no report is made—Order cannot be interfered with in appeal or otherwise.

Clause (3), S. 12, vests the power of making an appointment, where no report has been submitted in accordance with the last sentence of Cl. (1), in the Divisional Officer alone and neither the Collector nor the Board of Revenue can interfere with his order by way of appeal or otherwise. [P 314 C 2]

(c) Madras Hereditary Village Officers Act (1895), S. 21—Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—Suit for declaration that appointment of village headman under S. 15 is illegal and that plaintiff is legally entitled headman is cognizable by civil Court—Napier, J., contra.

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—S. 21, Madras Hereditary Village Officers Act prohibits civil Courts from deciding any claim to succeed to particular offices, but not any claim to be appointed in the first instance to any of those offices. A suit therefore for a declaration that an appointment of village headman made under S. 15, Madras Proprietary Estates Village Services Act is illegal and that plaintiff is the legally entitled headman is cognizable by a civil Court. [P 313C 2]

Per Napier, J., dissenting—A suit to declare that the plaintiff is a person eligible for a village office under the Madras Hereditary Village Officers Act of 1895 and that therefore the appointment of another person not eligible under the Act is bad, is not cognizable by a civil Court.

It is not open to a man who has no right and claim in himself, and does not bring the suit as a member of the public affected by the appointment, to ask for a declaration that the person appointed is not a person qualified to hold the office. [P 316 C 1]

(d) Madras Proprietary Estates Village Services Act (1894), S. 15 (3) — Proprietor selecting person outside family — Power of appointment does not vest in Divisional Officer.

Section 15 (3) does not vest the power of appointment in the Divisional Officer by reason of the proprietor having selected a person outside the family of the last holder of the office. [P 315 C 1]

(e) Madras Hereditary Village Officers Act (1895), S. 21—Office of headman may be held by two persons.

The office of headman may be held by two persons, one exercising Police and Magisterial functions and the other performing revenue and other duties. [P 314 C 2]

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar and T. M. Krishnaswami Aiyar—for Appellant.

V. Ramesam and T. Rangachariar—for Respondents.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The plaintiff is the appellant. His suit was for a declaration that the appointment of defendant 3 to the office of headman of the new village of Muthalapuram created by the amalgamation of two old villages, was illegal and that therefore the plaintiff's appointment by the Divisional Officer affirmed by the District Collector conferred the office upon the plaintiff. He also sued for recovery of the arrears of emoluments received wrongly by defendant 3. Defendant 3 among other pleas contended that the civil Court had no jurisdiction by the provisions of S. 21, Hereditary Village Officers Act, Madras Act 3 of 1895, to entertain such a suit. The lower Courts overruled this plea as to jurisdiction, but on the merits dismissed the plaintiff's suit. I shall first deal with the question of jurisdiction. S. 21 of Madras Act 3 of 1895 provides:

"No civil Court shall have authority to take into consideration or decide any claim to succeed to any of the offices specified in S. 3 or any question as to the rate or amount of the emoluments of any such office or, except as provided in prov. (ii). sub-S. (1), S. 13, any claim to recover the emoluments of any such office."

So far as the suit relates to the recovery of emoluments, it is prima facie barred by S. 21, unless the claim to those emoluments is excepted by prov. (ii), sub-S. (1) S. 13. But the proviso saves the jurisdiction of the civil Court only as regards recovery of land forming the emoluments of the office, and there is no prayer in the plaint for the recovery of any land as emoluments. So far therefore as the claim to emoluments is concerned, I think the civil Court has got no jurisdiction, and the lower Courts ought to have dismissed the suit so far as it relates to the claim for emoluments. Then coming to the suit so far as it relates to the two declarations (amalgamated into one in the plaint), namely, to the declaration (1) that the appointment by the Board of Revenue of defendant 3 is illegal, and to the declaration (2) that the plaintiff is the legally entitled headman of the new village, I think S. 21 does not apply to the claim for these two declarations. It has been held in Mavoulu Seetharam Naidu v. Doddi Rami Naidu (1) that S. 21 should be read along with S. 13 and that a suit in the civil Court is barred only where the relief claimed is such that the plaintiff could maintain a suit therefor before the Collector under S. 13. Under S. 13 a suit before the Collector can be brought only on the ground that the plaintiff is entitled to the village office on certain specified grounds. The claim in the present suit is not covered by those grounds and therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to bring any suit for these declaratory reliefs before the Collector, and hence S. 21 does not bar the maintainability of the present suit in the civil Court.

On another narrower ground also, S. 21 does not apply to the present suit, because S. 21 prohibits the civil Court from taking into consideration or deciding any claim to succeed to particular offices (which include the office now in dispute), but not any claim to be appointed in the first instance to any of those offices. I therefore agree with the lower Courts on the question of jurisdiction.

(1) [1910] 33 Mad 208=5 I.C. 137.

so far as the declaratory reliefs are concerned.

Coming to the merits, the newly created office of headman in the new revenue village falls, in my opinion, under both S. 9 and S. 15, Proprietary Estates Village Services Act, Madras Act 2 of 1894. I think that the two sections should be read together, where a question as regards the appointment to a new office created by the amalgamation or division of old villages has to be considered. The provisions of the two sections are not inconsistent with one another. Of course, Ss. 10 and 11 also should be read along with Ss. 9 and 15 so far as they can be made applicable to the new offices in a village newly created under S. 15. Reading the sections thus together, it is clear that the power of making an appointment to the newly created headman's office (which is the office now in question) vests in the first instance in the proprietrix, namely defendant 1 in this case. She appointed defendant 3 and reported her action to the Revenue Officer in charge of the Division in accordance with the last sentence of S. 15, in Cl. (1), Act 2 of 1894. Defendant 3, so appointed, was not disqualified under any of the five heads (a) to (e), sub S. (1), S. 10, Hence the Divisional Officer had no right to take any action under S. 11 of the Act. The only other provision empowering the revenue officer in charge of the division to interfere with an appointment made by the proprietrix is found in Cl. (3), S. 15. That clause says:

"If the propeictor fails to submit the report referred to in sub-Ss. (1) and (2) within six weeks of the creation of the new offices, etc," the powers vested in the proprietor by sub-Ss. 1 and 2 may be exercised by the revenue officer of the division. In this case, the proprietrix did not fail to submit the report and the Divisional Officer had therefore no right to exercise the powers of the proprietrix himself. No doubt. no special provision seems to have been made in the Act for a case in which the proprietrix in her report of appointment selects a person outside the families of the last holders of the offices which have been abolished, she being under an obligation by S. 15, Cl. (1), to select only such a person. It is argued that if a liberal construction is given to the language of Cl. (3), S. 15, that is, if the clause, be held to include a case where the report under sub-S. (1) makes an appointment of a person which the proprietrix is prohibited from making the Divisional Officer obtains jurisdiction to exercise the powers of the proprietrix. I do not think that the language of Cl. (3) is capable of such extension, though I must admit that I have come to this conclusion after much hesitation. Assuming however that Cl. (3), S. 15, did empower the Divisional Officer to exercise the powers of the proprietrix, if her appointment was not made from among the families of the last holders of the abolished offices, Cl. (3), S. 15 vests such powers in the Divisional Officer alone, not in any higher authority. No appeal is provided for in the Act to the Collector or from the Collector to the Board of Revenue in respect of orders passed by the Divisional Officer when exercising the proprietrix's powers so vested in him. I am therefore of opinion that so far as the orders of the Collector and the Board of Revenue are concerned, they were passed wholly without jurisdiction. Then we have to consider the question whether the proprietrix in selecting defendant 3 selected a person who was not among the families of the last holders of the abolished offices, and whether consequently the Divisional Officer had a right to act under Cl (3), S. 15, assuming that clause applies.

Both the lower Courts have come to the conclusion that defendant 3 did hold the office of Nattamaigar (headman) in one of the old villages which has now ceased to exist. It is well known that the office of headman, though in the olden days held by one person, had been in several cases in more recent times held by more than one person, usually two, of whom one exercises some only of the several responsible duties which belong to the undivided headman's office and the other the other remaining duties. The police and magisterial functions were usually exercised by one, and the revenue duties and the exercise of authority over the talayari, mirganti and the other village servants, so far as their duties were connected with the collection of revenue, were exercised by the other.

In such a case. both the officials can be called "headmen." Though in the popular view, that one of the two headmen who exercised Police and Magisterial functions might be considered as the more important officer, it cannot be said that the other headman did not also hold the office of headman. I therefore think that defendant 3's appointment by the proprietrix as headman is not illegal by reason of the fact that he had not usually exercised police and magisterial functions which had been exercised usually by the other headman, and I would therefore on this ground also uphold the dismissal of the plaintiff's suit by the lower Courts. The second appeal is therefore dismissed with costs —two sets.

Napier, J.—It would, in my opinion, be sufficient for the disposal of this case to hold that there is a finding of fact as to the position occupied by defendant 3 in the village which we are not competent to interfere with, and that therefore the appointment of defendant 3 by the village proprietrix is in accordance with law, and the suit necessarily fails. But several other questions have been raised as to the powers of the Courts and of the Revenue Officers, and have been dealt with by my learned brother and I wish therefore to make a few observations on some of them. The first point raised is whether the suit is not cognizable by the civil Court. It is suggested that the suit is not cognizable, because S. 21, Act 3 of 1895 says :

" No civil Court shall have authority to take into consideration or decide any claim to succeed to any of the offices specified in S 3 or any question as to the rate or amount of the emoluments of any such office, or, except as provided in proviso (ii). sub-S. 1, S. 13, any claim to recover the emoluments of any such office."

Now, with regard to the claim here, it does not appear to me to be a claim to succeed to any of the offices specified in S. 3, because the word "succession" is used in Act 3 of 1895 with reference to hereditary rights and no such right can be claimed. S. 11, Cl. (2), says as follows:

"The succession shall devolve in accordance with the law or custom applicable to the office in question at the date on which this Act comes into force," and the next clause says:

"Where the next heir is not qualified under sub-S. (1), the proprietor shall appoint the person next in order of succession who is so qualified, etc ," and Cl. 4 says:

"When the person who would otherwise be entitled to succeed to an office is a minor, etc."

Section 12 says:

"The succession to village offices forming Cl. (4) in S. 3 shall devolve in accordance with the law or custom, etc."

This appointment was made under S. 15 Act 2 of 1894, which provides that where there has been a re-grouping of villages, all the village offices shall cease to exist and new offices which shall be hereditary shall be created for the new village, and in choosing persons to fill such offices the proprietor should select the persons whom he may consider the best qualified from among the families of the last holders of the offices which have been abolished. Therefore no person can claim to be appointed under this section by virtue of a right of succession. So far as to the first part of S. 21, Act 3 of 1895. The next is, no civil Court shall have authority to take into consideration or decide any claim to recover the emoluments of such office, such office being an office specified in S. 3. The offices specified in S. 3 are, among others, hereditary village offices to which the Madras Proprietary Estates Village Services Act is extended, and other hereditary village offices in proprietary estates, except certain offices. Now it has been held by this Court in the case of Movoulu Seetharam Naidu v. Doddi Rami Naidu (1) that although there may be suits to recover emoluments which come within the language of S. 21 when read broadly, those suits unless they are such as could be filed in a Revenue Court under S. 13, are not excluded under S. 21. The suit in 33 Mad. 208 (1) was one to recover emoluments in the following circumstances:

"The plaintiffs case was that he was the Village Munsif of Balagudaba; that in the year Vilambi he leased to the defendant the suit lands which formed part of his Village Munsif's Akaram, for a cist of Rs. 40, and got akadapa executed in his favour; that after the expiration of the lease the defendant held possession of the land; that the plaintiff having made a demand on the defendant to pay the cist and to deliver possession of the land, the latter refused to do so."

So it was a claim to recover the emoluments of the office from a person who was holding them over after the expiry of the lease. Whether it would be necessary to go to S. 13 to decide that such claim was not covered by S. 21, I am not quite clear. At present I am inclined to think that apart from S. 13, S. 21 could not have been held to cover the case, and I do not think it necessary in this case to decide whether the view taken by the Bench in that case that no claim which is not covered by S. 13 is covered by S. 21 is correct or not. The language of the earlier part of the section is certainly very wide: it is, "to take into consideration or decide any claim to succeed to any of the offices, etc.," and it may be that there are cases which are not covered by S. 13 which should properly be taken under S. 21, and I am not satisfied yet that this suit is not within the mischief of S. 21. The fact that otherwise there would be no Court to try such a suit does not weigh with me as much as it did with the learned Judges who decided that case; because I am satisfied that there is no right of suit. This is a suit to recover emoluments and the office by a person who cannot found any claim on any right under the statute or by any appointment under the statute. It may be that if he had been appointed by the zamindar and the appointment had been cancelled by the Revenue Court, he would have been entitled to bring a suit to recover the office. But he was not appointed by the zemindar and therefore he cannot base any claim on appointment. What he seeks to do is to have it declared that he is a person eligible under the Act and therefore that the appointment of another person who is not eligible under the Act is bad. In my opinion no such suit will lie. The fact that he is eligible does not entitle him. S. 15, Act 2 of 1894, is specific on the point. It says:

"In choosing persons to fill such new offices, the proprietor shall select the persons whom he may consider the best qualfiied from among the families of the last holders of the offices which have been abolished."

This obviously may give a very wide sphere of selection, because two or more villages may be amalgamated and one can well imagine a case where four villages were amalgamated in each of which there was a headman with a certain number of members of his family. There might be 50 or 60 persons eligible for the appointment, and it is undoubtedly at the discretion of the proprietor which of these 50 or 60 men to appoint. It is not a case of a person having a right to succeed, as being next in order of succession, provided that he has the necessary qualifications. The plaintiff in this case has no right whatsoever to be appointed, and as he has not been appointed his position is no higher than that of any member of the public. I am clearly of opinion that it is not open to a man who has no right and claim in himself, and does not bring the suit as a member of the public affected by the appointment, to ask for a declaration that the person appointed is not a person qualified to hold the office. I am therefore of opinion that the suit fails on that ground, as well as on the ground that the person appointed is one whom the village proprietor could appoint.

I agree with my learned brother in the views he has expressed as to the powers of the revenue officer, and am satisfied that the Board of Revenue had no jurisdiction to set aside the order of the Collector on appeal any more than the Collector or Divisional Officer had any power to make the appointment. That is a matter however which does not affect the decision of this case, and it is sufficient to say that the suit has been properly dismissed for the reasons which I have just stated.

Madras District Municipalities Act (1884), S. 88 (1) (l)—Stable where one or more horses are kept — Livery-stable—Element of letting out on hire involved in use of places under S. 188 (1) (l)—Omission to take out license is offence.

Where the element of letting out on hire is involved in the use of the places indicated by the words in S. 188, Cl. (1) (l), a license should be taken out for keeping such a place and the omission to take out a licence is an offence.

Public Prosecutor—for the Crown.

Judgment.—The Bench Magistrates are no doubt right in saying that according to Queen-Empress v. Ayyakannu Mudali (1) the several words used in in Cl. (1) (l), S. 188, District Municipalities Act, "should be reasonably construed." But the reasonable construction indicated in the decision is that if the element of letting out on hire is involved in the use of places indicated by the words, the legislature intended that such places should fall under the section and a license ought to be taken out for keeping such a place and the omission to take out a license should be punished. The decision in Public Prosecutor v. Maduvalath Gopalan (2), Criminal Appeal No. 408 of 1902, reported in 1 Weir 737, is clearly applicable, the principle involved in that decision being, in our opinion, the same as that on which Queen-Empress v. Ayyakannu Mudali (1) was decided. Whether it is a single horse or more than one horse kept for hire in a stable, we think that the stable is a livery-stable: see also the definition of "livery horse" in Murray's New English Dectionary. We there set aside the acquittals in this case and in the connected cases, convict the accused under Cl. (1), S. 188, District Municipalities Act, and fine the accused each 8 annas.

Second Appeal No. 1116 of 1918, Decided on 10th February 1919, against decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Cuddalore, in A. S. No. 153 of 1916.

(a) Limitation Act (1908), S. 15—Attachment is not "injunction or order."

An attachment is not covered by the expression "an injunction or order" in S. 15: 8 Mad. 229, Diss. from. [P 318 C 2]

 (b) Limitation Act (1908), Ss. 6, 7 and 8—Assignee of minor is not entitled to privilege of extension.

The assignee of a minor cannot avail himself of the privilege of the extension of limitation given by S. 6. The exemption granted to the minor by the section is in the nature of a personal privilege which does not enure to a mere transferee. [P 320 C 1]

Per Oldfield, J.—S. 8 is ancillary to and restrictive of the concession granted in Ss. 6 and 7 and does not confer any substantial privilege. [P 318 C 1]

S. Subramanya—for Appellant.

Oldfield, J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment which my learned brother is about to deliver, and as I agree with his conclusion. I deal only with the one important question we have to decide: whether the appellant is entitled to the extension of time he claims as transferee from a minor. It does not appear material that his transfer was not voluntary, but was effected by attachment followed by a sale of the debt and an order vesting it in him as purchaser; and I assume that time did not begin to run before the minor's acquisition of the cause of action. Appellant's contention is that he is entitled to the full extension of time which the minor would have had if the cause of action had remained his property or, in the alternative, to three years from the date when his own ownership began.

This alternative contention can be dealt with shortly. It cannot be justified by any provision of the Limitation Act; for S. 6 (3) is as, will be shown, the only one extending time for a person other than the one disabled and it is inapplicable to appellant, a transferee during the latter's lifetime. In fact the argument in this form must rest solely on the tentative reasoning of Wilson, J., in Rudra Kant Surma Sircar v. Nobo Kishore Surma Biswas (1) that an alienation of the cause of action terminates the existing disability and on general principles carries with it the right to sue thereon which the alienor on such termination would acquire. But with all due deference although on general principles the transferor's right to sue may pass with the cause of action, that goes no way towards answering the question whether it does so, when the operation of those principles has been interrupted by the special law, with which we are dealing, and special considerations have been introduced; and it is still necessary to meet the argument of the majority of the Court that the disabled person's right to an extension is personal and does not necessarily remain alive after an alienation by him. Turning to appellant's argument in its wider form I need not repeat my learned brother's references to the cases. For although the actual current of authority, whatever its tendency here and in Bombay, is in respondent's favour it is not strong enough to conclude the question. To turn then to the relevant provisions of the Limitation Act, their wording does not authorize appellant's contention and their intention, so far as it can be deduced is against it.

Firstly as to the wording, S. 6 (1) throughout refers to one person only, the person entitled to sue or apply for execution, and does not admit of the violent construction proposed by appellant, that, one person being referred to as disabled, that person or in the alternative his transferee, are referred to later in the clause as eligible for indulgence; and in my opinion the possibility of such construction is further negatived by the specification in Cl. (3) of one person, for whose benefit the right to indulgence inheres in a qualified form, the legal representative, to the exclusion of the transferees from the disabled person during his lifetime. Next S. 8 can, it is argued, be regarded as extending time in favour not only of the minor or idiot concerned, but also of the person indirectly disabled from suing, the transferee. But this interpretation of the reference to the person "affected by the disability" is inconsistent with the meaning of disablility in Ss. 6 and 7, which are explicitly referred to and in which "disability" is used of the particular disabilities mentioned in the former, not of the disability to sue; and in any case S. 8 is statedly ancillary to and restrictive of the concession granted in those sections and does not confer any substantive privilege. It has been suggested that the definition of "plaintiff" in S. 2, as including a person from or through whom the right to sue is derived, is relevant to the discussion. But it plainly is not so, since this part of the Act is throughout expressed, no doubt advisedly, with reference to the person entitled to sue.

We are on even firmer ground when the intention of these provisions is considered. I repectfully concur in the opinion of the majority of the Court in Rudra Kant Surma Sircar v. Nobo Kishore Surma Biswas (1) that the privilege is personal and cannot be transferred with property or a right of action. I add only that, if the contrary were the case S. 6 (3) would be superfluous and S. 7 an exception to the principle, for which no reason has been shown, since if the privilege of one of the persons jointly interested attaches to the cause of action, it must attach to it is a whole, and the ability of one of such persons to give a discharge will be immaterial. In fact however the appellant's contention has been supported here, as it commended itself to Wilson, J., and might perhaps have commended itself in Subramanya Pandya Chokka Talavar v. Siva Subramanya Pillai (2), of a decision had been necessary, on grounds of convenience or in order to avoid anomaly. It is a sufficient answer that inconvenience and anomaly are almost inevitable, where the general law is overridden by personal privilege and natural expectations founded on the former are disappointed. It may be added that, where, as in England, the law is as appellant contends that it should be construed here, anomaly and inconvenience are nonetheless to be apprehended. Darby and Bosanquet, Statutes of Limitation, Edn. 2, p. 399. The appeal fails and is dismissed.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—Plaintiff's assignor obtained a decree against two persons. It was assigned to the plaintiff. In execution of the decree, he attached a book debt due to his judgment-debtors from the present defendant. That debt became due in August 1911. The attachment was made in November 1913. Plaintiff himself became the purchaser of the debt and a certificate was issued to him on 22nd February 1915. The present suit was brought on 15th March 1915. The question is whether the suit is in time. The first contention raised by the learned vakil for the appellant before us was that S. 15, Lim. Act, saved the bar because the attachment was pending between November 1913 and February 1915. This contention must be overruled. There is the direct decision of the Allahabad High Court in Shib Singh v. Sita Ram (3) to the effect that an attachment is not covered by the expression "an injunction or order" in S. 15, Lim Act. The Judicial Committee in Beti Maharani v. Collector of Etawa (4) held that in the case of an attachment before judgment S. 15 will not save the bar. In that decision they expressly approve the principle enunciated in Shib Singh v. Sita Ram (3). In Shunmugam v. Moidin (5) it seems to have been suggested that the prohibitory order issued during the attachment would come within the meaning of S. 15. That dictum cannot be regarded as good law in the face of Beti Maharani v. Collector of Etawah (4). Therefore the first contention fails.

As regards the applicability of S. 14, it is enough to say that the attachment proceedings are not based on the same cause of action as the suit to recover money on the book debt. Another contention was that there was an acknowledgment which saved the limitation. Ex. B, which is relied on as containing the acknowledgment, does not acknowledge a subsisting liability. The deponent distinctly says: "I have discharged the debt." This is not covered by Expl. 1, S. 19. Following Bollapragada Ramamurthy v. Thammanna Gopayya (6) I hold that there is no acknowledgment of any subsisting liability. The more difficult question relates to the applicability of S. 6, Lim. Act. It would have been better if the Subordinate Judge had given a decision on the facts, as to whether the original creditor of the defendant was a major at the time of the suit. That would have saved the discussion of the question of limitation which was very elaborately argued by the learned vakil for the appellant. But as he has not done so, it is necessary to deal with the abstract question of law. The point is whether the assignee of a minor can avail himself of the privilege of the extension of limitation given by S. 6, Lim. Act. In Rudra Kant Surma Sircar v. Nobo Kishore Surma Biswas (1) the matter was considered very fully by a Bench of five Judges. Garth, C. J., said:

"It seems to me that the provisions in the Limitation Acts, which relieve minors and others under disability . . . . . are purely personal exemptions."

Mitter, J., McDonell, J., and Prinsep, J., were all of the same opinion. In the referring judgment no doubt, Wilson and Field, JJ., seemed inclined to take the opposite view. This Full Bench decision has been followed in Calcutta in a number of cases. In Bombay in the earlier cases ending with Mahadev v. Babi (7), the same view was taken. But in Arjun Ramji v. Ramabai (8), the learned Chief Justice and Heaton, J., were apparently inclined to reconsider the question. In the case before them it was the personal representative, not an assignee, that brought the suit. There is no direct decision in Madras. In Subramanya Pandya Chokla Talavar v. Siva Subramanya Pillai (2) doubt seems to have been thrown upon Rudra Kant Surma Sircar v. Nobo Kishore Surma Biswas (1). But there is no decision of the question. In Ramanuja Ayyangar v. Sadagopa Ayyangar (9) it was held that where for a debt due to a minor a bond was executed benami to the mother, the mother cannot avail herself of the extended period of limitation on the ground that the real owner was an infant. In this state of the authorities it is desirable to consider closely the history and the language of S. 6. In 3 and 4 Will. IV C 27, the disability section is S. 16. This was amended by 37 and 38 Vict. C 57, S. 3, and the amended S. 16 provides:

"If such person shall have been under any of the disabilities hereinafter mentioned, (that is to say) infancy, coverture, idiotcy, lunacy or unsoundness of mind, then such person or the person claiming through him, etc."

It must also be remembered that in both 3 and 4 Will. IV there was a definition of the term "person through whom another claimed," and it clearly included the assignee. With those statutes before them the Indian legislature advisedly omitted the words "or persons claiming through or under them." It may be mentioned that even under the English section it is considered doubtful whether the assignee can get the benefit of the extended period: see p. 399 of Darby and Bosanquet. But apart from that if we come to the Indian Act we find in S. 6, Cl. (1), it is only the minor, the insane or the idiot who are mentioned as entitled to the benefit. Cl. (2) speaks of successive disabilities to such persons. Cl. (3) says that, where the disability continues up to the death of such a person, his legal representative may institute the suit. The special provision in favour of legal representatives, and the provision that such a representative can institute the suit after the death of the person who was under disability, make it clear that an assignee was not within the contemplation of the legislature and that suits by such assignees during the lifetime of the disabled persons should not have the benefit of the extended period. Cl. (4) makes a similar provision in favour of the legal representative when there have been successive disabilities. It seems to me that on the principle expressio unius personae vel rei, est exclusio alterius, S. 6 should be regarded as not applicable to assignees from a minor. These considerations show that the legislature regarded that exceptions granted to minors were in the nature of personal privileges, which should not enure for the benefit of a bare transferee. In my opinion therefore the appeal fails and must be dismissed. I agree with the order of my learned brother.

The mere fact that the kanomdar was not inducted into possession does not bar the mortgagor from suing for redemption. So long as the mortgage relationship is acknowledged by the mortgagee, the latter is estopped from questioning the mortgagor's title ; 12 I. C. 913, Foll.

Judgment.—We agree with the reasoning and the conclusion of the learned District Judge. The plaintiff executed to defendant 2, as the karnavan of his tarwad, Ex. A, the deed of mortgage now sued on. The suit is for redemption. The plea is that, as the defendants were not let into possession by the plaintiff, it is open to them to plead that the plaintiff has no title to sue. Dr. Pandalai contended before us that the view taken by the Full Bench in Venkata Chetty v. Aiyanna Gounden (1) is not applicable to mortgagees. We must now take it as settled that a kanom is an anomalous mortgage, although, as pointed out in the earlier decisions, there is in a kanom a combination of a mortgage and of a lease. Assuming for the sake of argument that S. 116, Evidence Act, is not in terms applicable to kanoms, we think the principles enunciated in Venkata Chetty v. Aiyanna Gounden (1) govern this case. The basis of the law of estoppel is not that possession has been given by one party to the other, but that both parties have entered into a specific relationship on the understanding that the rights incident to that relationship do subsist. In the case of tenants, this Court held that not only letting into the possession but also the relationship acknowledged by the tenant estops him from disputing his landlord's title. In the same way, the relationship acknowledged by the mortgagee estops him from denying his mortgagor's title. There may be an additional fetter on him if he was also inducted into possession. It is true that the cases Dr. Pandalai has placed before us do not hold that in cases where the initial possession was not taken from the mortgagor, the mortgagee will be estopped.

But we fail to see why the non-letting into possession directly by the mortgagor should act to his prejudice, if his title is otherwise acknowledged. Possession is only one of the indices of ownership but not the sole one. In one case at least, Hillaya Subbaya Hegde v. Narayanappa Timmaya (2), the proposition is stated broadly enough to cover cases where no possession was given to the mortgagee. We follow this statement of the law and hold that the defendants are estopped from questioning the plaintiff's title. The District Judge is right and we dismiss the second appeal with costs. Time for redemption is extended by three months from this date.

S. Srinivasa Aiyangar and P. Doraiswami Aiyangar—for Appellant.

Short, Bewes & Co.—for Respondents.

Wallis, C. J.—This is an appeal from a decree of the City Civil Court dismissing a suit brought by the Madras Corporation under S. 443, Madras City Municipal Act, 3 of 1904, to recover the costs of executing certain works which the defendants had been directed to execute. S. 224 requires the owner or occupier of any building within 14 days after receiving notice from the President to alter any existing latrine in accordance with such notice. The notice called on the defendants to alter the existing latrine into a flush but one of a design approved by the President. The plaint claimed to recover Rs. 1,647 paid to the contractor, Rs. 106-1-0 for connecting drains, Rupees 438-7-4 for supervision and Rs. 91-0-10 the costs of fixing a meter, and it was admitted that the Corporation took four months to execute the work. It was argued for the defendants that the word "latrine" did not include water closet and that the owner or occupier could not be required to convert a latrine into one. A reference to the New Oxford Dictionary shows that the word "latrine" is of Italian and French origin and found its way into Scotland in the seventeenth century. Like 'lavatory,' which has now acquired a similar meaning, it is derived from the Latin lavare, to wash. It appears to be wide enough to include conveniences with water connexions, and indeed to have been adopted in Municipal Acts as the most general descriptions of conveniences of the kind, and I am not prepared to hold that it does not include water closet. We are invited to hold that it did not with reference to the alleged history of drainage in this city, but, as pointed out by Lord Halsbury in Vestry of St. John, Hampstead v. Cotton (1), what has to be regarded is not the history of drainage in the locality but the words of the statute. Similarly I feel unable to hold that the addition of a water connexion to an existing latrine might not be such an alteration as is contemplated by the section if these words stood alone.

The great difficulty in the way of the Corporation arises, in my opinion from the provision in the section requiring the contemplated alteration to be made "within 14 days." This is a provision of an unusual character. In the English Public Health Acts works and alterations are required to be made within a time to be specified by the local authority, and in the present Act there is a general provision in S. 442 (1) that when anyone is required to execute a work, a reasonable time shall be named in the notice within which the work shall be executed. The importance of the time allowed in the notice in a case when the consequences of disobedience are so serious is illustrated by the recent decision of the Court of appeal that where the local authority is empowered by the statute to require the owner to execute certain works in a specified time, and the time specified in the notice is not reasonably sufficient for the execution of the works the notice is altogether void and the owner may disregard it with impunity: Bristol Corporation v. Sinnott (2), where an action like this brought by the local authority to recover the cost of doing the work themselves was dismissed on this ground.

(1) [1887] 12 App. Cas. 1.

Here the notice provided for in S. 224 is a 14 days' notice, and I think the learned Judge was quite right in holding that this express provision excludes the operation of S. 442 (1), which requires a reasonable time to be named in the notice. Whether the retention of the provision as to 14 days' notice when the section was re-enacted without alteration from the earlier Act of 1884, was the result of accident or design, these words must I think, so long as they remain in the section, be taken as an indication that the alterations contemplated by the section must be such as could reasonably be completed within 14 days, having regard to the nature of the work and all the circumstances. This conclusion is little more than an application to this section of the principles applied by the Court of appeal in the case just cited. It must be taken that the legislature cannot have intended to make disobedience of the notice a penal offence and a ground of civil liability unless compliance was reasonably possible. This was so far from being the case in this instance that the Corporation did not issue the 14 days' notice required by the section, but issued instead 30 days' notice which they had no power to do. The figure "60" was first inserted in the notice but this was struck out and "30" substituted; and as I have already stated, the Corporation themselves took four months to execute the work. The work not being such as would reasonably be executed in 14 days, the notice, in my opinion was bad and the defendants were entitled to disregard it.

Reliance was also placed on the provisions of S. 427, which gives a right of appeal from an order under S. 224 (1) to the Standing Committee, whose decision is to be final, but this point is also governed by the case already cited which decided, with reference to appeals under S. 268, Public Health Act, that the filing of an appeal under that section did not prevent the defendants from defending a suit of this kind if the appeal was never decided. Here no appeal was filed. The result is the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs. The whole question will no doubt receive attention in the new Municipal Bill which is now before the legislature.

Rathnasami Pillai—Plaintiff—Respondent.

First Appeal No. 271 of 1917, Decided on 25th April 1918, against decree of Sub-Judge, Kumbakonam, in Original Suit No. 17 of 1917.

(a) Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 21—Document held to be agreement to execute mortgage and not agreement to execute lease and hence did not require registration—Creditor in pursuance of document paying certain sums as advance—Debtor refusing to execute deed—Suit for specific performance can be enforced if borrower is not willing immediately to return advance and if lender is ready to pay balance—Otherwise plaintiff should be assessed only at damages for breach of contract—Registration Act (1908), S. 17 (2) and (5).

A document executed by defendant 1 in plaintiff's favour recited that the former was to execute in the latter's favour a swamibogam for 20 years from 1st May 1915 on receiving from him Rs. 5,000, that the entire amount including the interest thereon should be realizsd by enjoyment of the swamibogam, that the plaintiff should pay to defendant 1, 100 kalams of paddy, Rs. 300 in cash and 300 bundles of straw every year and at the expiry of 20 years deliver the land to defendant 1. The document also stipulated that if there was a delay in payment, a sum of Rs. 750 was to be added to the amount payable and the plaintiff was to supply labour of 50 workmen every year. It concluded with a provision that if the Rs. 5,000 be paid at the end of 8 years, the plaintiff should receive it and give up possession of the properties and the deed was to be cancelled. Plaintiff paid certain sums as advance and sued for specific performance of the agreement as defendant 1 refused to execute the deed:

Held: (1) that the document was an agreement to execute a mortgage and not an agreement to execute a lease and did not therefore require registration. [P 324 C 2]

(2) that a suit for specific performance of the agreement could be enforced if the borrower was not willing to immediately return the advance received by him and if the lender was ready to pay the balance remaining unpaid; otherwise the plaintiff should be assessed only at damages for breach of contract by defendant 1. [P 326 C 1]

Per Abdur Rahim J.—To decide whether a document is to be treated as a mortgage or as a lease the intention of the parties should be looked to. That intention has to be gathered mainly from the internal evidence furnished by the document itself, with such light as may be derived from the surrounding circumstances in which the document had its birth. The essential test to be applied to such cases is whether by the transaction in question the debt was secured or satisfied; if the former, it would be a mortgage, otherwise a lease. [P 324 C 1]

In India the general rule of English law is followed that Courts will not compel performance of contracts according to their tenor; on the other hand, the proper remedy for breach of a contract is compensation by way of damages for the loss arising from the breach. This is laid down in S. 21, Specific Relief Act. An ordinary contract to lend, or borrow, money whether on security or otherwise, comes within this category. Where on an agreement to execute a deed of mortgage money has already been advanced and the borrower refuses to execute a mortgage according to the agreement, the lender would be prejudiced if the loan were to remain without security and specific performance would be decreed if the lender offers to pay the amount of the loan or any amount remaining due under it. If the loan is liable to be repaid at once and the borrower offers to pay it off, there will be no object in decreeing specific performance. Ordinarily a party plaintiff is not entitled to claim specific performance of a contract to lend or borrow. If he comes into Court with such a specific prayer, and if there is nothing more in the plaint, the suit will be rightly dismissed. But where the prayer is strictly within the rights of the plaintiff, it is competent to the Court to annex conditions in the decree calculated to render justice between the parties. The domain of the rights of the parties is then passed and that of the functions of the Court comes into play. The Court, in the plenary powers it possesses of exercising discretion or of imposing suitable conditions in the interests of justice, being seised of the subject-matter of the suit, can proceed to annex or disannex conditions suo motu in order that complete justice may be rendered. [P 326 C 1]

(b) Registration Act (1908), S. 49—Unregistered document cannot be basis of specific performance—Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 21.

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—It is settled law that a document requiring registration cannot be the basis of a suit for specific performance. [P328 C 1]

(c) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 77—Contract that definite portion of income shall be paid annually to mortgagor may find place in agreement to give deed of mortgage.

Section 77 contemplates a contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that the income of the property shall be appropriated in a particular manner. A contract that a definite portion of the income shall be paid annually to the mortgagor may find a place in a deed of mortgage or in an agreement to give such a deed. [P 329 C 1]

A. Krishnaswami Aiyar and K. Balasubramania Aiyar—for Appellants.

T. V. Muthukrishna Aiyar and A. Swaminatha Aiyar—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—The defendants in the suit have appealed from a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Kumbakonam, by which he directed specific performance of an agreement (Ex. A) executed by defendant 1 on 31st October 1914 in favour of the plaintiff. The first point taken is that the transaction in question was an agreement to grant a lease and as it was not registered, it could not be specifically enforced. The second and alternative objection to the decree is that supposing it to be an agreement to execute a mortgage as found by the Subordinate Judge, even then all that the plaintiff will be entitled to would be damages and not a decree for specific performance. As regards the first question we have been referred to a number of decisions, some of which seem to be inconsistent with the others, but it is not necessary to discuss them in any detail.

In none of these cases, the question arose with reference to the application of the Registration Act. In most of them the nature of the transaction had to be considered in connexion with the provisions of the Stamp Act or the Limitation Act. That a transaction may combine the features partly of a lease and partly of a mortgage, does not admit of any dispute. That seems to be the nature of what is known as the zar-i-peshgi lease in Northern India or a kanam in Malabar: vide Bengal Indigo Company v. Roghobur Das (1), Nellaya Variath Silapani v. Vadakipat Manakel Ashtamurti Nambudri (2), Gopalan Nair v. Kunhan Menon (3). The Stamp Act contemplates and provides (a) for an instrument comprising or relating to several distinct matters (S. 5), and (b) for an instrument so framed as to come within two or more of the descriptions of transactions on which duty is payable under the Act. We are not concerned in this case with an instrument of the first class. The question is whether Ex. A is an agreement for the execution of an instrument which would fall within the definition both of a mortgage and a lease, or only of one of such transactions. Supposing it is the former if the question were as to the duty payable, the Stamp Act provides a simple answer. But the matter involves obvious difficulties when the question arises as to the application of the Limitation Act or the Registration Act, to such transactions. For then we have to find out the exact nature of the transaction taken as a whole before it can be ascertained which particular article of the Limitation Act is applicable or whether the document is compulsorily registrable or not. The solution, in my opinion, has to be sought in what was the intention of the parties, whether the transaction was intended to be a lease or a mortgage. This is the principle to be deduced from rulings. In Nellaya Variyath Silapani v. Vadakipat Manakel Ashtamurti Nambudri (2) a Full Bench of five Judges of this Court laid down that the question whether a kanom was to be regarded as a lease or a mortgage depended upon the object for which the tenure was created. There the question arose with reference to limitation. The learned Judges observed:

"In some cases it (that is, the kanam) may be a mere lease a sum being advanced as security for the rent or for proper cultivation to be repaid on the expiry of the term. In other cases, most frequently it is treated as a lease by way of mortgage to secure a loan advanced to the jenmi (proprietor) . . . The Limitation Act has no provision specially applicable to tenures of a mixed character. . . . For the purpose of limitation when as is alleged in the case before us it is intended as a mortgage, we must apply to it the law of limitation applicable to mortgages.

In Tukaram v. Ramchand (4) which was a Full Bench decision of the Bombay High Court, the question was raised with reference to a claim for redemption and the principle applied was, what was intended by the parties to the transaction. That intention has to be gathered mainly from the internal evidence furnished by the document itself with such light as may be derived from the surrrounding circumstances in which the transaction had its birth. The essential test to be applied to such cases is whether by the transaction in question the debt was secured or satisfied; if the former, it would be a mortgage, otherwise a lease. This seems to be the ratio decidendi of another Full Bench ruling of this Court in Reference under Stamp Act, S. 46 (5). Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar the learned vakil for the appellants, relied upon a recent ruling of a Division Bench in Kammara Peda Subbayya v. Kakerla Chennappa (6). In that case the learned Judges accepted the principle laid down by the Full Bench in Reference under Stamp Act, S. 46 (5) and whether their interpretation of the particular documents which they had to consider was correct or not, that is not a matter with which we are concerned. The document in question in the present suit provides that defendant 1 is to execute in favour of the plaintiff a swamibogam for 20 years from 1st May 1915 on receiving from him Rs. 5,000, that the entire amount including the interest thereon shall be realized by enjoyment of the swamibogam and that the plaintiff should pay defendant 1, 100 kalams of paddy, Rs. 300 in cash and 300 bundles of straw every year and at the expiry of 20 years deliver the land to defendant 1. The document also stipulates that if there be a delay in payment, a sum of Rs. 750 is to be added to the amount payable and that the plaintiff is to supply labour of 50 workmen every year. It concludes with a provision that if the Rs. 5,000 be paid at the end of eight years, the plaintiff must receive it and give up possession of the properties and the deed will be cancelled. It was not suggested by any one at the Bar that in this case there were two distinct matters, a lease and a mortgage, embodied in one document. The transaction is either a lease or a mortgage and for purposes of the Registration Act must be treated as one document. In my opinion the intention of the parties was to secure a debt and not to satisfy it within the meaning of Reference under Stamp Act, S. 46, (5). No doubt there is a stipulation for the payment of a fixed quantity of paddy and money to defendant 1 but even here the word "rent" is not used. There is also a provision for the supply of labour which is an unusual term in a mortgage. But the rest of the provisions clearly show that the parties contemplated a security. The benefit to be derived by the plaintiff, is in so many words said to be by way of interest and the last clause of the document provides that defendant 1 may redeem the property by the payment of the amount borrowed at the end of 8 years. It has been argued that the transaction does not fall within the definition of a usufructuary mortgage as given in S. 58, T. P. Act, but the Act clearly contemplates mortgages other than those defined in the Act. I hold therefore that Ex. A is an agreement to grant a mortgage and as such does not require registration.

Then, was the lower Court right in decreeing specific performance of this agreement, or is the proper remedy of the plaintiff by way of damages? It is settled law that the Court will not specifically enforce an agreement to lend or to borrow money whether on security or not: see Rogers v. Challi (7), Sichel v. Mosenthal (8) and Lanios v. Gurety (9). But specific performance was ordered in Ashton v. Corrigan (10) and in Hermann v. Hodges (11), where the money had actually been advanced and all that remained to be done was the execution of the mortgage agreed upon. In Ashton v. Corrigan (10) Sir John Wickens, V. C., said:

"I doubt whether a contract to execute a mortgage, which the mortgagee may enforce by a sale the day after its execution, is one which the Court will specifically perform and I know of no reported case in which such relief has been given where the right to it has been contested. However on the authority of the cases cited from Seton on Decrees, I will make the decree."

In Hermann v. Hodges (11) where the defendant did not oppose the decree, Lord Selborne, L. C., said that he had no doubt of the propriety of making the decree asked for unless the defendant was prepared to pay off the advance at once. Both were cases in which, so far as one can gather, the entire amount had been advanced. That is also how the scope of the rulings is stated in Fry's Specific Performance (Edn. 5), S. 54, p. 24, and Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 27, S. 125, p. 73, and Vol. 21, S. 135, p. 75. The question then is whether specific performance can be decreed where only a part of the advance has been made. In the last reference it is stated in the foot-note that in an Irish case, Hunter v. Langford (12), specific performance was ordered of an agreement to grant a mortgage for an amount of £30,000 of which £1,000 was already advanced. But this report has not been available to me. In Bass v. Chivley, (13) where the plaintiff agreed to advance £3,000 and actually advanced £600 in part, the defendant apparently submitted to a decree for specific performance according to the terms of the contract. It cannot be said that the question, whether a contract to lend money on security can be specifically enforced if only part of the amount to be lent had been advanced, was considered and decided by the Master of the Rolls.

On the other hand, there is the decision of the Court of appeal of England: South African Territories v. Wallington (14) and the House of Lords in South African Territories v. Wallington (15), where the defendant had applied for and paid 10 per cent deposit on some debentures, it was held that the company was not entitled to a decree directing the defendant to pay the rest of the instalments according to agreement. In the Court of appeal, Chitty, J., observed:

"It is clear that no specific performance of a contract to lend and borrow money can be granted at the suit either of the proposed lender or the proposed borrower. It is immaterial whether the loan is to be on security or without security, or whether the loan is to be for a fixed period; and it can make no difference whether the loan is to be made in one sum or by instalments."

This view of the law was confirmed by the House of Lords. No doubt the decree passed by Wright, J., which was in question in the appeal was rather peculiar. It did not in so many words grant specific performance, but gave a decree for the entire amount unpaid, and one of the arguments advanced in support of the decree was that the contract was for purchase of debentures on certain terms. But Sir Robert Reid, afterwards Lord Loreburn, also argued that if the respondent had paid all the instalments and the debentures had been withheld, the respondent would be entitled to specific performance and the remedy must be mutual. The learned Lords however did not think that specific performance could be extended to a case like the one before them where only part of the advance had been made. The principle of the decision of the House of Lords in South African Territories v. Wallington (15) and the other English cases has been followed in this Court in Rajagopala Aiyar v. Sheikh Davood Rowther (16), to which I was a party, and in Shaik Galim v. Sadarijan Bibi (17). In all those cases however the suit was by the borrower. The general rule of English Law, which in these cases is followed in India, is not that the Courts will compel performance of contracts according to their tenor; on the other hand, the proper remedy according to English Common Law for the breach of a contract is compensation by way of damages for the loss arising from the breach. The Courts of equity however assumed jurisdiction to compel the defaulting party to carry out the contract in its terms, in a class of cases where damages would not be an adequate remedy. Hence one of the conditions for the exercise of this equitable jurisdiction has always been that the Common law remedy should be inadequate. S. 21, Specific Relief Act, therefore says that a contract for the nonperformance of which compensation in money is an adequate relief, cannot be specifically enforced. An ordinary contract to lend or borrow money, whether on security or otherwise, comes within this category.

But supposing money has already been advanced and the borrower refuses to execute a mortgage according to the agreement, the lender would apparently be prejudiced if the loan were to remain without security, and it is difficult to see what difference it would make in this respect whether the entire loan had been advanced or only a portion, if in the latter case the lender has been ready and willing to advance the remaining sum according to the agreement. On the other hand if the loan was liable to be repaid at once and the borrower is willing to pay it off, there would be no object in decreeing specific performance in such a case. Hence it was that Lord Selbourne in Hermann v. Hodges (11) said that he would not decree specific performance of an agreement to borrow on a mortgage if the defendant was prepared to pay off the advance at once. If the loan was not repayable for a certain period, that would only affect the amount of damages and the method of calculation. The Courts of equity seem to be reluctant to force upon a man the position of a debtor if he is in a position to pay off the loan, though no doubt he will be made to compensate the other party for breach of the agreement. This seems to me to be the result of the authorities. Where however the borrower is not prepared to pay off the loan, to refuse specific performance in such a case of the agreement to execute a mortgage would be, as I have said, denying justice. In Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 21, p. 75, it is stated:

"In equity a mortgage is created by a contract to execute, when required, a legal mortgage, or by a contract that certain property shall stand as a security for a certain sum. The agreement may be enforced according to its terms even though the legal mortgage when executed will confer on the mortgagee an immediate power of sale."

This is supported by a number of decisions of the English Courts. The case however is to be distinguished where no money has actually been advanced, for there would be no question there of an equitable mortgage. In India except in the Presidency towns equitable mortgages are hardly recognized and it was argued by Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar, that if we accepted the proposition laid down by the House of Lords in South African Territories v. Wallington (15) in cases where the suit is by the borrower, the doctrine of mutuality required that the rule should be equally followed where the suit is by the lender. The two cases do not stand on the same footing. In the last case the lender would have altered his position and his money may be lost if specfic performance were not decreed, while in the other case the only question would be one of damages. Besides, if the doctrine of mutuality were strictly applied to these cases, there could be no specific performance even when the entire amount had been advanced, but none of the learned Lords in their judgments in the abovementioned case suggested any doubt as to the decision in Hermann v. Hodges (11) and Ashton v. Corrigan (10) which were cited at the Bar, and the text writers mention these cases with apparent approval.

The plaintiff has already paid about Rs. 4,250 to defendant 1 out of the Rs. 5,000 which he agreed to advance, Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar has offered on behalf of defendant 1 to pay up the amount though his client was not willing or prepared to do so in the Court of first instance. On payment by defendant 1 of this amount with profit thereon according to the terms of Ex. A to be ascetained by the lower Court within 4 months after the reopening of the said Court, the decree for specific performance will be set aside, and the lower Court will be directed to ascertain the damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the breach of the contract and pass a decree accordingly. The plaintiff must either produce an acquittance in respect of the amount payable under the promissory note in favour of Krishna Mudaliar within the period specified above or execute a bond of indemnity in favour of defendant 1. Failing either, the amount payable under the above mentioned promissory note will be deducted from the amount payable to the plaintiff. In default of such payment, the decree of the Subordinate Judge will be confirmed and the appeal dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of the respondent up till now in this Court and in the lower Court. Future costs, if any, will be disposed of by the Subordinate Judge.

Seshagiri Aiyar. J.—I have come to the same conclusion. On 31st October 1914 defendant 1 entered into an agreement with the plaintiff to execute a deed of swamibogam of the properties in suit, Rs. 250 was paid on that day and the balance of Rs. 4,750 was agreed to be paid on the execution of the document, which was to be on 15th April 1915. Subsequent to the agreement, at the request of the defendant, plaintiff agreed to pay a sum of Rs. 2,000 due from the defendant to one Hrishna Mudali. He also paid Rs. 655 on 29th January 1915 and a sum of Rs. 515-9-0 on 3rd April 1915 directly to the defendant. The plaintiff's case is that, notwithstanding the receipt of these moneys the defendant refused to execute the swamibogam deed, and that therefore he should be compelled to execute the document. Defendant 1 denied the payments above referred to and contended that the document on which the claim for specific performance was based was not receivable in evidence as it was not registered. The Subordinate Judge in a careful judgment found all the points in favour of the plaintiff, and passed a decree directing the execution of the deed on payment of Rs. 759-15-8. Defendant has appealed.

Before dealing with the main contentions in the case, I shall dispose of the minor points argued by Mr. Balasubramania Aiyar. It was suggested that the two sums of Rs. 515-9-0 and Rs. 655 were not independent payments, but were paid as rent due to the defendant in respect of the previous occupation of the properties by the plaintiff. In the day book of the plaintiff Exs. J-1 and J-2 these two payments are entered as advances to the defendant. There is no reason to doubt the accuracy or genuineness of these two documents. There is reliable evidence that the defendant was in need of money at this time and that he received the moneys not as being entitled to them as landlord, but only as borrower. I see no reason to differ from the Subordinate Judge in his appreciation of the evidence on these points.

As regards the sum of Rs. 2,000, the Subordinate Judge has dealt with it at some length in para. 9 of his judgment. Shortly put, the position of affairs was this. The defendant was indebted to Krishna Mudali in a sum of Rs. 2,000. Plaintiff was asked to discharge that debt. Two months after the date of the agreement in question, the plaintiff executed a promissory note for that amount to Krishna Mudali. Krishna Mudali thereupon endorsed payment on the original promissory note given by the defendant to him. It is thus clear that Krishna Mudali absolved defendant from liability and looked to plaintiff for payment. When the parties fell out, defendant 1, who is a relation of Krishna Mudali, induced another relation of his, defendant 2, to execute a fresh promissory note to Krishna Mudali, ignoring the endorsement upon the note which he executed and also the promissory-note executed by the plaintiff. It is said that a suit has been brought by Krishna Mudali for the sum due. I feel no hesitation in agreeing with the Subordinate Judge that Krishna Mudali and defendants 1 and 2 have colluded together and are acting in concert to make the Court believe that the liability of defendant 1 to Krishna Mudali has not yet been discharged. I accept the conclusion of the Subordinate Judge that the sum of Rs. 2,000 must be deemed to be a payment by the plaintiff to the defendant. The defendant, notwithstanding these payments has not delivered possession of the properties to the plaintiff. The Subordinate Judge was therefore right in calculating interest on the payments and in holding that the plaintiff had paid on the date of the suit a sum of over Rupees 4,000 to defendant 1.

Oneother small matter may be disposed of before proceeding further. In the agreement there is a stipulation that if the defendant did not execute the document in time, the plaintiff would be entitled to add a sum of Rs. 750 to the Rs. 4,750 remaining due and to get a document executed as if he had paid Rs. 5,500. This is purely a penal provision, and I do not think that Courts will be justified in directing specific performance of an agreement with these penal terms. The Courts have a discretion to vary the terms of a contract and to delete so much of it as in their opinion is not equitable. Now I proceed to consider the main questions argued by Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar for the appellants. The first contention was that the document in question is an agreement to lease and as it is not registered, it should not have been received in evidence in support of a claim for specific performance. It is settled law : see Narayanan Chetty v. Muthiah Servai'(18) that a document requiring registration cannot be the basis of a suit for specific performance. The question is whether Ex. A is an agreement to lease or an agreement to mortgage. If it is the latter, it does not require registration. If it is the former, it must be registered. An intermediate position is that the document may be construed as a combination of an agreement to lease and also to mortgage. In that case, the further question would be whether it should be registered.

On the construction of the document, various authorities were quoted by the learned vakil. Before dealing with them, I shall examine the provisions of the document. It says that (a) the defendant has agreed to give the plaintiff in swamibogam the nanja and punja properties for 20 years from 1st May 1915 ; (b) the consideration is stated to be Rs. 5,000, of which Rs. 250 was acknowledged to have been received on the date of the agreement ; (c) the balance of Rs. 4,750 was agreed to be paid within 15th April 1915 when the deed itself was to be executed by the defendant ; (d) the said Rs. 5,000 and the interest thereon were to be realized by the enjoyment of the properties for 20 years. There are provisions for payment of kist which I need not refer to now ; (e) the plaintiff agreed to pay the defendant 100 kalams of samba paddy, Rs. 300 in cash, 300 bundles of straw and also to procure 50 labourers for each year ; (f) it is stipulated that the land should be delivered after a period of 20 years ; (g) there is a penal provision for adding Rs. 750 more in case the defendant did not execute the deed on 15th April 1915, and lastly (h) the document provides for enjoyment of the properties for eight years certain, and for redemption by the defendant notwithstanding the fixed period of 20 years at any time after the eighth year on payment of Rs. 5,000. In my opinion, the document is a usufructuary mortgage, and falls strictly within the definition of the terms contained in S. 58, Cl. (d), T. P. Act. Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar contended that the provision for the delivery of paddy, money and straw to the defendant took the document out of the category of usufructuary mortgages. I am inclined to think that the clause in S. 58 (d) does not prevent the payment of a portion of the usufruct to the mortgagor. In my experience of the Southern Presidency, it is almost an ordinary term of a usufructuary mortgage to provide for the payment either of a consolidated sum or of an annual snm to the mortgagor ; and I am not satisfied that such a provision is obnoxious to S. 58, Cl. (d), T. P. Act. The clue to the interpretation of the definition may be gathered from Ss. 76 and 77, T. P. Act. Cl. (g), S. 76 provides for the mortgagee keeping clear and accurate accounts of all sums received and spent by him and also directs the mortgagee to give the mortgagor true copies of such accounts and of the vouchers by which they are supported ; Cl. (h) provides for the surplus of the usufruct being paid to the mortgagor under certain circumstances. S. 77 provides that nothing in Cls. (b), (d), (g) and (h) [(b) being a provision for the collection of rents and profits and (d) being a provision for repairs] applies to cases where there is a contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that the receipts from the mortgaged property shall be taken in lieu of interest on the principal money or in lieu of such interest and defined portions of the principal as may be agreed upon. As I understand this section, it means that ordinarily having regard to the fact that the relationship is that of debtor and creditor it

But this duty may be dispensed with where there is a contract between the parties that the usufruct, whatever it may amount to, shall be applied in a definite way towards the liquidation of the debt or of the interest on the debt. In other words, S. 77 contemplates a contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that the income of the property shall be appropriated in a particular manner. I fail to see why a contract that a definite portion of the income shall be paid annually to the mortgagor should not find a place in a deed of mortgage or in an agreement to give such a deed. Therefore without reference to the authorities, I am of opinion that the document in question is an agreement to give a usufructuary mortgage. No doubt the terms of S. 105, T. P. Act, are to a large extent complied with by this agreement. The Rs. 5,000 may be regarded as premium, and the annual payment may be regarded as rent. The insertion of a clause as to enjoyment during a specified period is also within that section : but in a lease simpliciter, there will be no provision for interest upon the amount ; and there will not be a provision for redemption as in the present document. I am therefore unable to hold that this is an agreement to lease.

There is no doubt a possibility of construing it as a combination of an agreement to mortgage and to lease. The elements which make up a mortgage are to be found in the provision relating to principal and interest and to the redemption of the property after a fixed period. It is also clear that the property is regarded as security for the moneys to be advanced. The supplementary provision regarding the annual payment is in the nature of a lease. Therefore, there is great force in the contention of the learned vakil that the document in question partakes of the character of a lease and of a mortgage. Even in that view, as I shall show presently, the document would not require registration ; but my inclination is to regard the document as purely a usufructuary mortgage, because a mortgage of that kind has many elements in common with a lease. Now I shall deal with the cases quoted at the Bar. The citations from Dr. Ghose's book on Mortgage, Vol. 1, pp. 95 and 96, only point to the difficulties attendant upon the construction of such documents. The learned author, after referring to the conflict of judicial opinion, inclines in favour of holding similar documents to be agreements to mortgage and not to give a lease. With one observation of his, I am in entire agreement, namely that the construction must be based upon the intention of the parties and not upon an academical discussion regarding the inapt words used in the instrument. In Reference under Stamp Act, S. 46 (5) the question for consideration before the Full Bench was as to the stamp to be affixed on the document. There were three instruments before them, but we are concerned only with the third of them. The learned Chief Justice who delivered the judgment of the Court says that :

" although the parties may have understood and described the transaction as a mortgage, it was in fact a sale of a term or a lease for 9 years with a reserved rent of Rs. 35, in consideration of Rs. 899-12-0, the amount of the debt and interest."

It is not shown that there was any provision for redemption in that case. This opinion of the Chief Justice may no doubt, be taken as suggesting that although interest may be payable upon the advance the document may still be regarded as a lease. I do not think that this case covers the present. In Kammara Peda Subbayya v. Kakerla Chennappa (6) the question related to limitation. There the document was completed. It was not an agreement that the learned Judges had to consider. Ex. B, which is given in full in the judgment, contains no stipulation for redemption as in the present case. Therefore this is not an authority which is conclusive on the point. On the other hand, the cases quoted by Mr. Muthukrishna Aiyar on behalf of the respondent show that documents like the present one should be construed as mortgages. Mashook Ameen Suzzada v. Marem Reddy (19) is a case in point. In Reference under Stamp Act, S. 46 (20) four Judges of this Court held that a provision for enjoyment of the property for a particular period coupled with a loan rendered the document a usufructuary mortgage. No doubt the opinion was given with reference to the amount of stamp duty payable. It is also true that there was no provision for the payment of rent as such. I do not think that in the present case it can be said that there is a provision for payment of rent as such. Reference may also be made to Mahmad Muse Umarji v. Bagas Amanji Umar (21). I do not propose to consider the other cases quoted before us, as, in my opinion, the document in suit is strictly within the definition of the term "usufructuary mortgage" and the provision for redemption would be inconsistent with the parties having intended to treat it as an agreement to lease.

The intermediate view which I referred to, namely of regarding the document as a combination of mortgage and lease, derives its support from the decision of the Judicial Committee in Bengal Indigo Company v. Roghobur Das (1). The other decisions, Reference under Stamp Act, S. 46 (22), Nellaya Variyath Silapani v. Vadakipat Manakel Ashtamurti Nambudri (2), Perlathail Subba Rau v. Mankude Narayana (23), and Gopalan Nair v. Kunhan Menon (3), also regard documents more or less of a similar character as not wholly within the category of usufructuary mortgages. Granting that the document in question is not an agreement to mortgage, I am unable to agree with the contention that it should be registered under the Registration Act. Under S. 17, Registration Act, written instruments referred to in Cl. (1) sub-Cls. (a), (b) and (c), which would include sales, gifts and mortgages, should be registered, if the value exceeds Rs. 100. Sub-Cl. (5), Cl. (2) in terms excludes from this liability documents which, by themselves, do not create, declare, assign etc., rights in immovable property. That clause makes it clear that an agreement to sell or to mortgage need not be registered because Cl. (2) begins by saying that :

"nothing in Cls. (b) and (c), sub-S. (1) applies to the following instruments."

It is noticeable that sub-Cl. (d), Cl. 1 is not referred to in Cl. 2. Cl. 1 (d) says that :

"leases of immovable property from year to year, or for any term exceeding one year, or reserving a yearly rent should be registered."

As I said before an agreement to give a lease is not among the exempted documents in Cl. 2. Further the definition of the term "lease" in S. 2 includes an agreement to lease as well ; whereas, under the definition of the terms "mortgage" or "sale" as contained in the Transfer of Property Act, an agreement to mortgage or an agreement to sell would not be included. It is rather an anomalous position that an agreement to lease should be compulsorily registrable whereas an agreement to give a mortgage or to sell should be exempted from such a provision. However the legislature has chosen to impose such a liability upon agreements to lease alone, and we are bound to give effect to that intention. At the same time, it is clear that unless a document comes strictly within the four corners of the expression "lease" we would not be justified in holding that the document should be registered. The learned vakil for the respondent drew our attention to some decisions which have held that provisions relating to registration should be very strictly construed. Amjed Ali v. Ala Buksh (24) and Jiwan Ali Beg v. Basa Mal (25) have laid down this principle. I am in entire agreement with these decisions. In my opinion, any provision which has the effect of preventing parties from adducing in evidence a specified document for want of a technicality should be very strictly construed, and therefore unless a document is a lease, pure and simple, I see no reason for applying S. 17, Cl. 1 (d), Registration Act, to such instruments. If the term regarding the lease is only incidental to the main provisions of the document, I am prepared to hold that such a document need not be registered. I am also impressed by the argument for the respondent that, at best, the document in question is an anomalous mortgage as was held in Raman Nair v. Vasudevan Namboodripad (26) and Kaderkutti v. Imbichi (27). If it is a mortgage of that description my view is that it does not require to be registered, because it would come under Cl. 1 (b) and (c) and Cl. 2 (5), S. 17, Registration Act. In this view, it is unnecessary to consider the further point argued by Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar that if there was a combination of a mortgage and lease, the unregistered document cannot be looked at even for the purpose of enforcing the term relating to the mortgage.

The next important point is whether even if it is an agreement to give a usufructuary mortgage, a suit for specific performance is competent. The learned vakil for the appellants with his usual ability contended that, if the amount agreed upon was not fully paid, by asking for specific performance, the plaintiff would be compelling the defendant to accept the loan with reference to the balance remaining unpaid. In South African Territories v. Wallington (15), it is definitely laid down that a contract to lend cannot be specifically enforced, affirming the decision of the Court of appeal in South African Territories v. Wallington (14). That principle has been followed in this country in Shaik Galim v. Sadarijan Bibi (15). Ramakrishna Pattar v. Narayana Patter (28) also belongs to the same class. Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar contended that an agreement to borrow stands on the same footing as an agreement to lend. It is not necessary for me to disagree with that contention, although I am not prepared to hold that the principle of mutuality as laid down in Flight v. Bolland (29) is of universal application. Without quoting many cases, I may refer to Jones v. Tankerville (Earl) (30) where the principle of mutuality has been departed from to some extent. The decision in Mir Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin Mahomed Chowdhuri (31) does not say that such a principle is of universal application.

If in this suit, the only prayer was that the defendant should be compelled to accept the balance of the loan, I would have agreed that the suit should be dismissed. The principle of the English decisions followed in this country is that no person should compel another to accept a loan as he could very well advance it to another, and it would be unjust to compel the would-be borrower to accept it as he could in open market procure the loan easily. But in the present case, the object of the suit is not to compel the defendant to accept the loan. The aim is to obtain the security for the money already advanced and that security having been promised by the document, the defendant is bound to fulfil it. There is a decision of the Allahabad High Court in Mayaram v. Prag Dat (32) in which Mahmood, J., expresses a doubt whether, even when the whole of the money agreed upon has been paid, the plaintiff will be entitled to sue for specific performance The learned Judge is apparently of opinion that money compensation would meet the ends of justice in such cases. I am afraid that the learned Judge has not adverted to the fact that the securing of a security by a lender is far more important to him than the obtaining of a decree for money against the borrower.

This view of Mahmood, J., is opposed to two decisions of very eminent Judges in England in Ashton v. Corrigan (10) and Hermann v. Hodges (11). In 21 Halsbury 75 the law is thus summarised:

"In equity a mortgage is created by a contract to execute, when required, a legal mortgage, or by a contract that certain property shall stand as a security for a certain sum."

In Fry on Specific Performance, the same principle is enunciated. In S. 54 the law is thus stated:

"The Court will specifically enforce a contract to execute a mortgage, and that even with an immediate power of sale, where the money has been actually advanced either before or at the time of the contract."

I fail to see why these principles should not be followed in this country. Therefore I am of opinion that the suit as brought was rightly instituted. As regards the proper remedy to be given, there is room for considerable divergence of opinion. The Subordinate Judge has decreed specific performance of the entire contract on payment of the balance due. It was argued by Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar that this provision in the decree indirectly compels the defendant to accept the balance of the loan. Speaking for myself, I do not think that this objection is well founded. What the House of Lords has laid down in the case already referred to is that a party plaintiff is not entitled to claim specific performance of a contract to lend or to borrow. If he comes into Court with such a specific prayer and if there is nothing more in the plaint, the suit will be rightly dismissed. But where the prayer is strictly within the rights of the plaintiff, it is competent to the Court, to annex conditions in the decree calculated to render justice between the parties. The domain of the rights of the parties is then passed and that of the function of the Court comes into play. The Court, in the plenary powers it possesses of exercising discretion or of imposing suitable conditions in the interests of justice, being seised of the subject matter of the suit, can proceed to annex or disannex conditions sue moto in order that complete justice may be rendered. I do not think that the principle that there cannot be a suit for specific performance either to borrow or to lend has any application to the exercise of the Court's powers as above indicated. In my opinion therefore the view taken by the Subordinate Judge that specific performance should be decreed on payment of the balance was well within his jurisdiction.

There is authority for enforcing the contract in its entirety even though the full amount has not been paid. Mr. Muthukrishna Aiyar quoted Bass v. Clively (13), wherein Sir Johan Leach, the Master of the Rolls, decreed specific performance of a contract to mortgage even though the full amount had not been paid. This case is no doubt open to the construction put upon it by Mr. Krishnaswami Aiyar that the decree was by consent. But if the decree could not be passed, the Master of the Rolls would not have acted on the consent, therefore the procedure adopted must be taken to have been legal. I fail to see why the Courts should not do what the parties can agree to and impose a condition for the payment of the balance before specific performance is decreed. There is also a citation in 21 Halsbury at p. 75 under note (b) of an Irish case of Hunter v. Langford (12), in which specific performance was ordered of an agreement to grant a mortgage for a loan of £30,000 of which £1,000 alone had been already advanced. In my opinion therefore the decree of the Subordinate Judge is not wrong. My learned brother thinks that this is a case in which our discretion should be exercised by decreeing damages, rather than decreeing specific performance. I agree with the order proposed by my learned brother as to costs, damages and indemnity.

Marudai Muthirian — Defendant—Petitioner.

Chinnakanu Muthirian — Plaintiff—Opposite Party.

Civil Revn. Petn. No. 67 of 1918, Decided on 10th October 1918, against decree of Small Cause Court Judge, Trichinopoly, in Suit No. 2804 of 1917.

(a) Limitation Act (9 of 1908), Art. 61—Joint mortgage bond—Payment in excess—Suit for contribution against co-mortgagor—Limitation commences from payment of last payment.

A suit to recover excess payments made by the plaintiff towards a joint mortgage bond executed by himself and the defendant, is a suit for contribution and must be brought within the period of limitation prescribed by Art. 61, Sch. 1 Lim. Act, the period counting from the date of the last payment made by the plaintiff: any payment made by the defendant subsequently thereto would be of no avail to the plaintiff. [P 333 C 1]

(b) Limitation Act (9 of 1908), S. 19—Acknowledgment of liability.

Where a plaintiff, who is about to get a mortgage bond assigned to himself, receives a notice from the defendant that "if you get an assignment, out of the sum of Rs. 100 that may still be due my liability will be only Rs. 50": the notice does not amount to an acknowledgment of liability to the plaintiff. It is only an acknowledgment of liability under the bond. [P 333 C 2]

(c) Civil P. C. (5 of 1908), O. 7, R. 6—Suit barred by limitation—Ground saving limitation must be specifically stated.

Where a suit is brought after the prescribed period of limitation, it is incumbent on the plaintiff, under O. 7, R. 6, to state explicitly the ground on which the bar is saved. [P 333 C 1]

Judgment.—I am unable to agree with the learned Small Cause Court Judge on the question of limitation. The facts are not in dispute. The plaintiff and the defendant had jointly executed a deed of mortgage to one Appaniengar. The amount secured by the mortgage was Rs 300, which came to nearly Rs. 533 with interest thereon. The plaintiff paid admittedly Rs. 306 and the defendant only Rs. 227. This is a suit to recover from the defendant contribution for the amount which the plaintiff had paid in excess of the amount due from him. There were various pleas in the lower Court and I need not refer to all of them now. The only point is whether this suit was within time as one for contribution. The last payment by the plaintiff was made in January 1914 and the suit was instituted on 2nd July 1917. Prima facie it was more than three years since the accrual of the cause of action The learned Judge in the Court below was of opinion that as the defendant made payment under the bond in September 1914, the bar of limitation was saved. He is clearly wrong in this view. It is not the payment of the defendant that matters, but it is the payment by the plaintiff that gives him the right to sue, as the plaintiff's claim is in respect of the excess payment made by him. To such a suit, Art. 61, Lim. Act, is clearly applicable and under that article the suit must be brought within three years of the date of payment. If any authority were needed for this view, I may refer to the order of reference made by Bhashyam Ayyangar, J., in Rajah of Vizianagram v. Rajah Setrucherla Somasekhararazu (1). The learned vakil for the petitioner did not support the judgment of the lower Court on this point. What he contended was that the claim against the defendant was saved by the acknowledgment under Ex. 4. It was a registered notice sent on 26th July 1914, before the defendant had made the last payment. At that time, defendant heard that the plaintiff was about to get the mortgage bond assigned to himself and he sent this notice saying that:

"if you get an assignment, out of the sum of Rs. 100 that may be still due my liability will be only Rs. 50.."

This is not an acknowledgment of the liability to the plaintiff. It is only an acknowledgment of the liability under the bond. Apart from this there is another fatal objection to regarding Ex. 4 as an acknowledgment, because under O. 7, R. 6, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff who brings the suit after the prescribed period of limitation to state explicitly the ground on which the bar is saved. He has not stated that. There is no issue about it and there is no evidence connecting Ex. 4 with the liability which the defendant was under to the plaintiff. For all these reasons, Ex. 4 cannot be regarded as saving limitation. As I already mentioned, the suit was brought more than three years after the last payment made by the plaintiff and as such it is barred by limitation. The decree of the Subordinate Judge must be reversed and the suit dismissed with costs throughout.

T. B. Mehta and Sons—Respondents.

Original Side Appeal No. 4 of 1918. Decided on 4th December 1918, from judgment of Coutts-Trotter, J., D/- 13th December 1917.

(a) Presidency Towns Insolveney Act (1909), S. 56—It must be shown that transaction was entered into with dominant view of preferring particular creditor.

To bring a transaction within the scope of S. 56, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act it must be shown that it was entered into with the dominant view of preferring the particular creditor. [P 334 C 2]

(b) Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (1909), S. 56—"Fraudulent preference"—Test for determination—Chief intention or state of mind of person making transfer must be looked into.

The test for determining what is fraudulent preference within the meaning of the section is, not whether the effect of the particular transfer or payment is fraudulent or whether there has as a fact been a preference, but what was the chief intention or state of mind of the person making the transfer, and it is not sufficient to say that the natural consequence of the act being to prefer, the intention to prefer follows. [P 337 C 2]

(c) Presideney Towns Insolvency Act (1909), S. 56—"With a view to prefer" means with the view to prefer.

The words "with a view to prefer" in the section mean "with theview to prefer": 32 I. C. 795 Diss. from; Lake, In re (1901) and 1 Q. B. 710, Exnl and Dist. [P 334 C 2]

(d) Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (1909), Ss. 55 and 56—Transfer for full consideration and not amounting to act of insolvency—Purchaser having no notice of act of insolvency—Transfer is not void.

Where a transfer is made for full consideration and does not amount to an act of insolvency by reason of an intent to defeat or delay creditors or otherwise and the purchaser has no notice of an act of insolvency the transfer is not voidable under S. 55 of the Act. [P 335 C 1]

A person in insolvent circumstances in order to meet pressing claims, sold some of his diamonds, which were under pledge with various persons, to the respondents, who were one of his large creditors. The arrangement was that the latter should buy the diamonds at an agreed price, pay the amounts due on the pledges and credit the balance towards their accounts. The price settled was fair and by the sales not only were the pledges redeemed but a very large portion of the debt due to the garnishee was also discharged, while much heavier debts on promissory notes to othor creditors were left undischarged. The transferor was some time after adjudged an insolvent. On an application by the Official Assignee to declare the transfer void and under Ss. 55 and 56, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act :

Held : that the transfer was not voidable either as a fraudulent preference or as wanting in good faith under Ss. 55 and 56 of the Act. [P 335 C 2]

(c) Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (1909), S. 56—"Good faith"—Transaction should not be in fraud of bankruptcy laws.

Per Napier, J.—The words "in good faith" in S. 56 require that the transaction should not be in fraud of the bankruptcy laws. [P 338 C 1]

M. D. Devadoss, Short and Bewes—for Appellant.

Nugent Grant, Grant and Greatorex—for Opposite Parties.

Wallis, C. J.—This is an appeal from an order of Coutts-Trotter, J., dismissing the Official Assignee's application by notice of motion for a declaration that the sale of diamonds by the insolvent on and after 19th May 1917 to the garnishees, T. B. Mehta and Sons, was void as a fraudulent preference under S. 56, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, or in the alternative under S. 55, as the sale was not bona fide and for valuable consideration. In my opinion, the decision of the learned Judge was right on both points. We are not now concerned with the propriety or morality of the insolvent's conduct in obtaining large quantities of diamonds on credit from various firms and pledging them for advances to Nattukottai Chetties and in persisting in this course when he was clearly in insolvent circumstances and had no prospect of paying for them. These are matters to be taken into consideration at another stage. In the middle of May 1917 the insolvent was in very embarrassed circumstances and was unable to meet his obligations as they fell due. He was indebted to the garnishees, Messrs. Mehta and Sons, a Madras firm, with whom he had had large transactions in Rs. 36,062 against which eight hundies were outstanding and also in Rs. 3,000 on general account. Two hundies which fell due on 19th were not presented at his request (Ex. 10, dated 14th May 1917), but a third hundi which fell due on the same day was not met and they began to press him. The insolvent then proposed that the garnishees who were diamond merchants should purchase from him diamonds which were under pledge to various Nattukottai Chetties and apply the surplus, after discharging the pledges, in satisfaction of the hundies.

The diamond market was then rising and Mehta accepted the offer and in the course of five transactions between 25th May and 12th June purchased diamonds to the extent of Rs. 28,000 and in this way obtained payment of the hundies. It is not now disputed that he paid a fair price for the diamonds. An examination of the pledgee's accounts in the course of the case revealed the fact that the purchases by the garnishees from the pledgees were larger than was necessary to pay them off out of the surpluses and that the insolvent was paid over Rs. 41,000 by the pledgees as a result of the transactions. The evidence is that this result was obtained by including in the sales, apparently without the garnishees' knowledge, other diamonds which were not under pledge. Any adverse inference that might arise from this fact is negatived by the evidence that between 25th May, the date of the first of these sales, and his arrest at the end of June, he made payments to the other creditors amounting to more than Rs. 71,000 to meet his more pressing obligations and at the same time put off other creditors. All this shows that he went on trading when in hopelessly insolvent circumstaances, not that he entered into the transactions now impugned with a view to prefer these particular creditors. The learned Judge has rightly held that to bring a transaction within the scope of S. 56 it must have been entered into with the dominant view of preferring the particular creditor.

That construction has recently been criticised in an unreported case in this Court as proceeding upon a consideration of cases decided before the section was enacted. Bowen, L. J., deprecated this mode of construction in Griffith, Ex parte (1) and Hill, Ex parte ; Bird, In re (2) and in the latter case expressed the opinion, on a careful consideration of the various ways in which the language of the section could be construed, that the words "with a view of giving a creditor preference over other creditors" must be read as equivalent to "with the view," the real, effectual, substantial view, of giving a preference to the creditor, the word "a" being equivalent to "the."

(2) [1883] 23 Ch. D. 695=52 L. J. Ch. 903.

That construction was accepted and was approved by the House of Lords in Sharp v. Jackson (3) several years before that section was re-enacted in India in 1907 and again in 1909, and the Indian legislature must, in my opinion, have contemplated that that construction would be followed here. In the present case the evidence, in my opinion, does not show that the insolvent entered into these transactions with the dominant view of preferring the garnishees because, as is suggested, they were Madras creditors whereas most of the other creditors were in Bombay. The evidence rather shows, in my opinion, that he was acting throughout exclusively in his own interest and with a view to keep his business going which he could not do without satisfying the garnishees creditors' on the spot who were pressing him to meet his obligations and were not to be put off with excuses. As regards S. 55, the sales now in question were for full consideration and did not amount to an act of insolvency by reason of an intent to defeat or delay creditors or otherwise, and the purchaser had no notice of an act of insolvency. In these circumstances they must be held to have been made in good faith and for valuable consideration and not to be avoided under S. 55. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs. Costs on the original side scale.

Napier, J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Coutts-Trotter, J., on a motion on behalf of the Official Assignee for a declaration that certain sales of jewels by the insolvent, Muthiah Chetty, to the firm of T. B. Mehta and Sons are void as not being bona fide transactions and further as constituting a fraudulent preference of that firm in that the proceeds were largely utilized for discharging certain promissory notes given by the insolvent to the firm. The insolvent was a diamond merchant in a large way of business in Madras, purchasing diamonds here to a certain extent and to a much larger extent in Bombay. At the time of the sales he was in fact hopelessly insolvent. The sales covered a period between 25th May and 12th June 1917 and were completed in five transactions: on 25th May, 2nd June, 7th June, 8th June and 12th June. Nearly all the diamonds sold were under pledge to various lenders and the sales purported to be, according to the evidence of the garnishee, of those diamonds only, the garnishee buying the diamonds at an agreed price, paying the amount due on the pledge and crediting the balance as against promissory notes, with the result that the whole of the promissory notes and an amount due on a general account to the garnishee was discharged, while much heavier debts on promissory notes to other creditors were left undischarged. The learned Judge has found that the sales are not void nor fraudulent preference.

Mr. Devadoss has attacked these findings as being based on an erroneous view of the law and also contends that on the true view of the facts they cannot be upheld. His contention on the law was as follows: that every transaction by which a creditor is given a preference is presumably fraudulent and that there are only three conditions under which such transactions will be sustained, namely where the transaction is to recoup a breach of a trust, where the transaction is compelled by threats of legal proceedings and where the insolvent bona fide believed he could avoid bankruptcy and entered into the transaction for that purpose. In my opinion there is no warrant for this contention. All that Mr. Devadoss has been able to do is to invite our attention to cases in which these conditions have been held sufficient to establish that there was no fraudulent preference in the particular case. I entirely agree with what fell from the learned Chief Justice at the beginning of the argument that what we have to do is to construe the Act with the assistance of decisions of eminent Judges in England on similar words in the English statute. The learned trial Judge, although he does not refer to the language of the section, starts with this proposition that he has to consider what was the dominant motive of the insolvent in carrying through this transaction. I agree that this is real consideration in the case, but I think it advisable to state how this proposition is arrived at.

The Act to be construed is the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act 3 of 1909, and the important sections are S. 9 which defines an act of insolvency, S. 55 which avoids certain transactions made within two years of insolvency, S. 56 which declares certain transactions within three months of the insolvency fraudulent and void, and S. 57 which protects certain transactions. The corresponding English Act is the Bahkruptcy Act of 1883 and the corresponding sections are Ss. 4, 47, 48 and 49. Dealing first with fraudulent preference, the words of S. 56 with which we are concerned are:

"Every transfer of property, every payment made, by any person unable to pay his debts as they become due from his own money in favour of any creditor, with a view of giving that creditor a preference over other creditors, shall, if such person is adjudged insolvent, on a petition presented within three months after the date thereof be deemed fraudulent, and void as against the Official Assignee."

The language of S. 48 of the English Act is mutatis mutandis identical. The first thing to be noted about this section is that it does not say that every transfer of property or payment by such a person with the effect of giving the creditor preference is fraudulent and there can be no doubt that if the legislature had intended to avoid all transfers and payments in favour of a particular creditor without considering the motive or the object of the insolvent, it would have used some such words as the above or omitted the words "with a view," etc. We have therefore to construe the words " with a view giving that creditor a preference" as an essential requirement for a fraudulent preference. The learned Judge in the course of his judgment has referred with disapproval to an obiter dictum of a Judge of this Court in a case not reported in the authorized reports, but to be found in Nalam Viswanatham v. Official Assignee of Madras (4). I do not think that Coutts Trotter J's., criticizms are quite justified on the language of my learned brother, though I am not prepared to agree with some of the observations to be found in that language. I must say also that I think that the learned Judge's language is useful as drawing the attention to the fact that we have to construe a particular statute and not to apply principles founded on words which are not in the particular statute. The true rule of construction was laid down in 1891 by the House of Lords in the well-known case of the Bank of England v. Vagliano (5) and approved by the Privy Council in Norindra Nath Sarcar v. Kamalbasini Dasi (6). I am not certain that this rule has always been borne in mind in decisions on questions of fraudulent preference in cases in England, and I specially refer to a decision which was pressed on us by Mr. Grant, Cheesebrough, In re (7), from which, so far as the process of reasoning is concerned, I must respectfully dissent. We have however the guidance of very eminent Judges in England in cases where the language of the English statute was critically analysed and I propose to refer to a few of them.

The first case which is very much in point is in Griffith, ex parte (1) and especially the language of Bowen, L. J., at page 74*. He there refers to the fact that in judicial decisions since the Bankruptcy Act there has been a tendency among Courts to discuss the question whether the Act had altered the old law and introduced an entirely new law with the result that the Court has been drawn into questions of pressure and volition and into motive of a motive, whatever that may mean, and he lays down that the true method is to go back to the words of the statute and be guided by them. Here we have a very eminent Judge applying the principle which was subsequently laid down in Bank of England v. Vagliano (5). The next is Hill, ex parte; Bird, In re (2). In that case the same learned Judge speaking of S. 92 the corresponding section of the Bankruptcy Act, of 1869, says as follows:

"Whether that section has or has not altered the old law is not a matter that need be decided, though there is considerable authority for saying that it has not. But however that may be we have to look to the words of S. 92, and they are "with a view of giving such creditor a preference over other' creditors."

He then considers the meaning of the words "a view" and says:

"I should prefer keeping to the word 'view' instead of 'motive', though in nine cases out of ten the two words may come to the same thing."

He declines to accept the suggestion that the words "a view" mean "sole view" on the ground that if the legislature had so intended it would have used the word "sole". He is of opinion that the word "a" is equivalent to "the" and considers that "the view' means the dominant and substantial view.

These two cases were followed and applied by a Division Court in Bell, In re Official Receiver, Ex parte (8). That was a case where pressure was relied on as taking the case out of the Statute and Wright, J., laid down that in such a case it must be found that pressure was the substantial ground of the payment being made which is of course equivalent to saying that the intention to prefer would not be the substantial ground. Vaughan Williams, J., says:

"The law is well established now that one has to ascertain in each case what was the dominant motive which operated on the bankrupt's mind."

And in another part of the judgment "was the substantial, effectual or dominant view with which the debtor made the payment a preference of that creditor?"

The next case is the decision relied on by the learned Judge in Sharp v. Jackson (3). There the learned Lord Chancellor endorses the view of Lord Esher in the Court of appeal in the same case that the question depends not on the mere fact that there has been a preference but also on the state of mind of the person who made it and that it is not sufficient to say that the natural consequence of the act being to prefer, the intention to prefer follows. This decision is specially important as it has been treated in subsequent cases as endorsing the correctness of the decision in the Court of appeal in the same case. That is sub nominee, New, Prance and Garrard's Trustee v. Hunting (9). I have already referred to one extract from Lord Esher's judgments. Other passages are as follows:

"What had he obviously in view when he executed this deed? . . . . . It seems to me clear that he made this conveyance, not with the 'intention' or 'view' or 'object' or whatever it may be called, of preferirng these persons, but for the sole purpose of shielding himself. Under these circumstances what he did is not a fraudulent preference within the Act."

A. L. Smith, L. J., says:

"I have always understood that, to ascertain whether there has been a fraudulent preference, it is necessary to consider what the dominant or real motive of the person making the preference was; whether it was to defraud some creditors by preferring others, or for some other motive."

Chitty, L. J., says:

"I ask myself what was really the view which Prance had in making this conveyance. Was it to prefer these particular trust estates to other creditors? No; it was to protect himself against the charges hanging over him."

There can be no doubt that the Court of appeal in this case were applying the tests laid down in Griffith, Ex parte (1), Hill, Ex parte; Bird In re (2) and in consequence of this unanimity of the Court of appeal and its endorsement by the House of Lords, Wright, J., in Buckley's case (10) said as follows:

"Ever since the decision in New, Prance & Garrard's Trustee v. Hunting (9), which has since been affirmed by the House of Lords (Sub-nom, Sharp v. Jackson (3)) so little difficulty has been felt by gentlemen who practise in bankruptcy matters that questions of fraudulent preference comparatively seldom now arise."

It is clear on the authority of these cases that no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to what facts will take a particular case out of the statute and it is not open to us to hold, as Mr. Devadoss would wish us to do, that certain circumstances only have been accepted by the Courts for this purpose and no other circumstances will suffice. Mr. Devadoss relied on a decision in Lake In re (11), a breach of trust case. But this case is really against him, for there Wright, J., finding that there had been several breaches of trust of which only one was made good, held that there was a fraudulent preference. The Court of appeal, it is true, found on the facts that it was not. But the learned Judges did not lay down, and I venture to think, could not lay down, a definite rule that where there are breaches of trust and one is made good, there cannot be a fraudulent preference. Indeed, on these facts I would myself prefer the finding of Wright, J. [His Lordship then deals with the facts of the case.] I therefore agree with Courts Trotter, J., that these transaction did not amount to a fraudulent preference.

The remaining questions can be shortly disposed of. It follows from the above finding that the transfer was not an act of bankruptcy under S. 9, Cl. (b). With regard to S. 55, which invalidates transfers not made in good faith and for valuable consideration within two years of insolvency, it has been established by the evidence of an expert witness that the price paid by the garnishee for the jewels was only 4 per cent. less than the valuation he would put on them. It is hardly necessary to say that such a variation cannot indicate anything more than a difference of opinion. There is no evidence that the garnishee knew that the insolvent was carrying through this transaction for any other purpose than that which he (the garnishee) thought namely discharging the liabiiity to him, or that he was getting more money than was required for discharge of the pledge. Indeed Mr. Devadoss conceded this. There was therefore no want of good faith within the ordinary meaning of the term. It is true that the words "in good faith" have been held both in England and in this Court to require that the transaction should not be in fraud of the bankruptcy laws. But, as there has been no fraudulent preference, it follows that there has been no fraud of the bankruptcy laws. In these circumstances I do not think it necessary to consider the case of Shears v. Goddard (12) and other English cases on the point. I therefore agree with the learned Chief Justice in dismissing the appeal with costs.

Judgment.—One Kolandaiswamy Devar obtained a lease for 30 years of the village in dispute from the Zamindar of Sivaganga in 1882. In 1886 he executed Ex. 1 to the defendant Ex. F is the muchilika from the defendant to Kolandaisawmy. In March 1887 the suit village and other villages were permanently assigned to Kolandaiswamy by the Zamindar. The right of the assignee was purchased in Court auction by the present plaintiff and he sues to recover arrears of rent from the defendant. The defendant pleaded that under Ex. 1 he was bound to pay only the rent provided in the document and that plaintiff was not entitled to demand waram. The main issue in the case was whether Ex. 1 conferred a permanent right on the defendant. Both the Courts below were of opinion that it was not a permanent patta and that it was open to the plaintiff to revert to waram. We are unable to agree with this conclusion. The document on the face of it fixes a permanent rate of rent for all time to come. The words "for ever and ever" occur in three places and are coupled further with words of inheritance, namely the property shall descend to heirs. We are unable to hold that Ex. 1 is merely a lease for a fixed period.

Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar for the respondents referred to Boddington v. Robinson (1) and contended that the nature of the estate possessed by the grantor is a conclusive test of the nature of the grant made to the grantee. That decision does not support this extreme contention. No doubt, in considering the extent of the interest granted by a person, the nature of his right may be taken into account. Generally, if the language of the grant is ambiguous, such considerations may be of avail. But where the language is unambiguous and clear, we do not think in construing a grant the extent of the right possessed by the grantor should have any weight. S. 8, T. P. Act, was also relied on. That section lays down that the grantor must be deemed to have conveyed only what he was capable of conveying. It is not a canon of construction but a rule relating to the legal effect of a grant. The observations of the Judicial Committee in Radhakant Lal v. Mt. Nazama Begum (2) support this view. For these reasons we are of opinion that prima facie the terms of a document must be looked at to ascertain the nature of the estate granted by it, and it is only where there is any doubt about its import that other considerations can be taken into account. In our opinion Ex. 1 conveyed an absolute estate. The further question is whether it is binding upon the plaintiff. On the one hand, Mr. T. M. Krishnaswami Aiyar for the defendant relied upon S. 43, T. P. Act, and upon S. 26, Estate Land Act. On the other hand, Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar referred to the well-known principle enunciated in Patman v. Harland (3) by Jessel, M. R., that where a man has notice of the document, he must be deemed to have notice of the terms of the document and contended that as both parties were cognizant of all the facts, no question of estoppel either under S. 115 or S. 43, T. P. Act, can arise. Without expressing any opinion whether constructive notice of the contents of a document would disable a party from relying upon an actual representation, we think that further facts ought to be ascertained in this case before applying the law. In the first place, we must know whether the facts alleged in para. 7 of the written statement are true and also whether the defendant was otherwise actually aware of the nature of the estate which Kolandaiswamy had at the time of Ex. 1. Also before applying S. 26, Estates Land Act, Courts must know what was the state of the property at the time of Ex. 1 and why a permanently low rate of rent was fixed at the time of the grant. It is only on the ascertainment of these facts that the law can be applied. The issues that must be tried are:

(1). Whether the plaintiff made any representation as stated in para. 7 of the written statement. (2) Whether the defendant was aware that Kolaindaiswamy had only a limited estate. (3). Under what circumstances and why a favourable rate of rent was fixed in Ex. 1. (4). Whether by operation of S. 26, Estates Land Act or by the principle of estoppel enunciated in S. 43, T. P. Act, the plaintiff is precluded from reverting to waram? As the determination of these issues would involve the taking of further evidence and as the case was disposed of on a preliminary point, we think in the circumstances of the case, it is desirable that the decrees of both the Courts should be reversed and the case should be remanded to the Court of first instance for disposal in the light of the above observations. Parties may be permitted to file additional statements. The Court may also frame further issues, if necessary and give further opportunities to the parties for adducing evidence. We order refund of court-fee; costs to abide.

Second Appeal No. 368 of 1918, Decided on 21st January 1919. against decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Tellicherry, in Appeal Suit No. 2 of 1917.

(a) Easements Act (1882), Ss. 15 and 16—Period of tenancy is to be deducted only if suit is brought within three years after termination of term—Fact that owner allowed tenant to hold over makes no difference.

Under S. 16 the time during which the servient premises have been in occupation of a tenant or lessee for any term of years is to be deducted in computing the period of enjoyment of the easement claimed, only if that claim is resisted within three years next after the termination of the term by the owner of the land. The fact that the owner did not determine the tenancy and allowed the tenant to hold over does not affect the question and the prescriptive right acquired by the dominant owner by enjoyment for 20 years becomes absolute within the meaning of S. 15. [P 341 C 2]

(b) Easements Act (1882), Ss. 15 and 16—Right to light and air by way of easement cannot be acquired for limited period.

Per Abdur Rahim, J.—Under the Easements Act a prescriptive right to light and air cannot be acquired by way of an easement for a limited period, such as during the occupation of the servient heritage by a lessee. [P 341 C 1]

(c) Easements Act (1882), Ss. 8 to 19—"Impose" in Ss 8 to 19 means creation of easement by voluntary Act.

Per Abdur Rahim, J.—The word "impose" in the sections in Ch. 2 means the creation of an easement by a voluntary act of the owner or lessee or of any other person having power to transfer an interest in the servient tenement. [P 340 C 2]

Per Phillips, J.—The word "impose" in Ss. 8 and 11, Easements Act does not necessarily mean imposition by some act such as a grant, but includes imposition by omission to take steps to prevent acquisition by prescription.

(d) Easements Act (1882), S. 7—"Owner" does not necessarily mean absolute owner.

Per Phillips, J.—The word "owner" in S. 7 cannot be interpreted as meaning necessarily absolute owner. The whole scheme of the Act seems to imply that easements can be acquired even against limited owners, as lessees or persons having a derivative interest in the property.

K. P. M. Menon and B. Pocker—for Appellants.

C. Kunhiraman—for Respondents.

Abdur Rahim, J.—The plaintiffs in this suit claimed an easement of light and air acquired by prescription over the premises in occupation of the defendants. The dominant tenement is a warehouse and the lower appellate Court has found that with respect to the windows 11 to 16 in the plan, Ex. B, the plaintiffs who are in the occupation of the warehouse had been in unobstructed enjoyment of light and air since the year 1877 until the defendants threatened to obstruct the access of such light and air by building a two storeyed warehouse on their land shortly before the institution of this suit in 1913. From 1877 to 1887 the land was in the possession of a tavazhi to whom the Orkatteri tarwad had made a grant of it for maintenance. In 1887 the defendants obtained the land from the tavazhi on a kanom of 12 years. On its expiry in 1899 they continued in possession without any lease until 1905, when they obtained a fresh kanom for another term of 12 years. Neither the tavazhi, the lessor of the defendants, nor the superior proprietor, the tarwad, has taken any steps to resist the plaintiffs' claims and the question is whether the defendants' possession since 1887 as tenants of the servient heritage is a bar to the maturing of the plaintiffs' prescriptive rights.

On the question whether a prescriptive right to access of light and air can be acquired in the nature of an easement for a limited period, for instance, during the time the servient tenement is in the occupation of a lessee for years, I am of opinion that it cannot. S. 15, Easements Act 5 of 1882, lays down that "where the access and use of light or air to and for any building have been peaceably enjoyed therewith, as an easement, without interruption, and for 20 years . . . . . , the right to such access and use of light or air . . . . . shall be absolute;"

and S. 16 says:

"Provided that, when any land upon, over or from which any easement has been enjoyed . . . . . has been held under or by virtue of any interest for life or any term of years exceeding three years from the granting thereof, the time of the enjoyment of such easement during the continuance of such interest or term shall be excluded in the computation of the said last mentioned period of 20 years, in case the claim is within three years next after the determination of such interest or term, resisted by the person entitled, on such determination, to the said land."

These sections imply that by reason of a prescriptive easement the rights of the owner of the servient tenement are modified or restricted to that extent and not merely those of the lessee for the term of his lease. No doubt an easement may be permanent or for a limited period, as stated in S. 6. But the question is whether an easement for a limited period can be acquired by prescription. In Ch. 2 the imposition, acquisition and transfer of an easement are dealt with. Wherever an easement is spoken of as "imposed," the phrase is used to mean the creation of an easement by a voluntary act of the owner or lessee or of any other person having power to transfer an interest in the servient tenement. This will be apparent from Ss. 8, 9, 10, 11, 20, 28, 37 and 40 and the illustrations appended thereto, especially those to S. 9. They show that the imposition of an easement as contemplated is to be by such an act as a grant or a bequest of the owner or occupier of the servient heritage. That a lessee can create or impose an easement by a grant for the period of his term cannot be doubted. see S. 11. In contradiction to such "imposition" of an easement by the owner or lessee of a servient tenement, the legislature speaks of acquisition of an easement by the owner of the dominant heritage by prescription or custom, in Ss. 15, 16, 17, and 18 elsewhere. There are no express words in the Act providing for the acquisition of an easement for a limited time by prescription by the owner or occupier of the dominant heritage, though the Act in various places deals with the imposition of an easement by the owner or lessee of the servient tenement. And in my opinion without the intention of the legislature being in this connexion expressed in so many words or capable of being inferred from any plain indications in the Act, we should not be justified in recognizing a prescriptive right to light and air by way of easement for a limited period, such as during the occupation of the servient heritage by a lessee, when it is clear that no such right has ever been recognized by the English law. The English law on the subject is clearly stated in Wheaton v. Maple (1) by Lindley, L. J., in the Court of appeal :

"The whole theory of prescription at common law is against presuming any grant or covenant not to interrupt, by or with any one except an owner in fee. A right claimed by prescription must be claimed as appendant or appurtenant to land, and not as annexed to it for a term of years (p. 63);"

and further on after quoting the words of the English Prescription Act 2 and 3 William 4, C. 71,

"the expression 'absolute and indefeasible, as applied to easements of all kinds ..... shows that the easements dealt with were easements appendant or appurtenant to land, and which, when acquired, imposed a burden for ever on the servient tenement. This view of the statute was clearly expressed soon after it was passed in Bright v. Walker (2), and although some passages in Baron Parke's judgment in that case have been criticized, and even dissented from, the broad view which underlies the judgment has never been disapproved. That view, as I understand it, is that the Act has not created a class of easements which could not be gained by prescription at common law, or in other words, has not created an easement for a limited time only or available only against particular owners or occupiers of the servient tenement. Such easements can only be created since the Act as before the Act, viz., by grant or by an agreement enforceable in equity, which for most purposes is as efficacious as a deed under seal. Such a grant or agreement must moreover be proved as a fact and not be purely fictitious."

It will appear from Gale on Easements, Edn. 9 (pp. 210, 211 etc.), that this exposition of the law has been accepted without question or doubt in England. If the Indian legislature, which must be presumed to have been familiar with the English law on the subject, intended to alter it on this point, it would have plainly expressed or indicated such intention. But the plaintiffs have, in my opinion, nevertheless acquired an absolute title to light and air by prescription as claimed by them by reason of the fact that their claim was not resisted by the owner of the premises within three years of the termination of the period of the defendants' lease in 1899. The clear effect of S. 16 is that the time during which the servient premises have been in occupation for any term of years is to be deducted in computing the period of enjoyment of the easement claimed, only if that claim is resisted within 3 years next after the termination of the term by the owner of the land. The owner did not resist the plaintiffs' claim for 3 years and more after 1899 and it follows that the plaintiffs' right acquired by enjoyment for 20 years became absolute within the meaning of S. 15, Easements Act. The fact that the defendants continued in possession as tenants by holding over after the expiry of the lease for years cannot make any difference.

It was also argued on behalf of the appellants that the tavazhi, whose tenants the defendants were, held the servient premises for life within the meaning of S. 16. I have no doubt that the grant for maintenance of the tavazhi can never be called an interest for life as contemplated by the Act, unless it can be shown that it was intended for certain definite lives. We have no document to show what the terms of the grant were, supposing there was a grant, and as the Subordinate Judge finds, the arrangement, such as it was, was capable of being revoked at any time by the tarwad to whom the property belonged. The appeal therefore fails on all the points argued before us and must be dismissed with costs.

Phillips, J.—This suit is brought by the plaintiffs for an injunction restraining the defendants from obstructing the access of light and air to the plaintiffs' warehouse. The warehouse was built in 1877 and the land now in the possession of the defendants was in the possession of its owner from 1877 to 1887. In 1887 the land was demised on kanom for 12 years and was held over until 1905, when there was a fresh renewal for 12 years. The defendants' land belongs to the Orkatteri tarwad and was allotted to a tavazhi for maintenance. The kanom demises were granted by the tavazhi. Two questions arise for consideration in this appeal : (1) whether an easement right can be acquired by prescription against a tenant for the term of his tenancy, and (2) ; whether by virtue of S. 16, Easements Act, the owner of the land is prevented from disputing the easement claimed, because he did not resist the easement within 3 years of the determination of the tenancy from 1887 to 1899. So far as the second question is concerned, it appears that the plaintiffs enjoyed this easement right from 1877 until the date of suit in 1913, which is a great deal longer than the statutory period of 20 years prescribed for the acquisition of an easement by prescription. For part of this period, namely, from 1887 to 1899, the land was in the possession of the defendants and their predecessors as tenants under the kanom granted to them for 12 years. This kanom expired in 1899 and it would therefore appear that unless the owner intervened within 3 years from 1899 the easement would become absolute. It is contended for the defendants that the term had not been determined by the landlord, and therefore S. 16 would not apply. S. 16, is however clear. It says :

(2) [1834] 40 R. R. 536.

"When any land ..... has been held ..... for any term of years exceeding three years from the granting thereof, the time of the enjoyment of such easement during the continuance of such ..... term shall be excluded in the computation of the said lastmentioned period of twenty years, in case the claim is, within three years next after the determination of such .... term, resisted by the person entitled on such determination, to the said land."

The contention is that the determination of such term means the determination of the tenant's right, and it is argued that inasmuch as the tenants were allowed to hold over for 6 years and were then confirmed in their right by a renewal deed, there has been no determination of their right. The language of the section is however clear. In the words "determination of such term", "such term" means "any term of years exceeding three years from the granting thereof." In this case a term of 12 years was granted and when that term expired it must be held to be a determination of such term. The landlord did not take advantage of his right to intervene within 3 years of that date, and therefore the period of tenancy is not excluded in the computation of the period of 20 years. A further argument is put forward, namely, that the kanom was not granted by the owner but by the tavazhi, which itself had only a life-interest in the land. No evidence has been adduced as to the exact terms on which the tavazhi was in possession of the land but the kanom deed, Ex. 3, merely recites that the land has been set apart towards the expenses of the Orkatteri house. Even if there had been a grant to the tavazhi it would not be a grant of a life-interest, for there is no one life during which such interest could subsist and the interest would continue so long as the tavazhi existed. It is not however proved that there was any grant to the tavazhi, and I think it must be held that the tavazhi was allowed to enjoy this land under the tarwad and that its possession was nothing more than the possession of the tarwad. In that view the landlord was really the tarwad acting through its agent the karnavan of the tavazhi, and S. 16 would be applicable. In this case, I think that the plaintiffs have made their right absolute by more than 20 years' enjoyment and are entitled to a decree. The first question is one of greater difficulty, the contention for the appellants being that no easement right can be acquired by prescription against a tenant and this appears to be the principle recognized by the Common law of England; vide Wheaton v. Maple (1) and Kilgour v. Gaddes (3). In an earlier case apparently a contrary view was suggested: Daniel v. Anderson (4). and in two Irish cases this contrary view was adopted: Beggan v. M'Donald (5) and Fahey v. Dwyer (6). The question is whether the Common law principle has been embodied in the Indian statute, the Easements Act. It is not disputed that a tenant could grant an easement for the period of his tenancy even under English law. But the possibility of its acquisition by prescription is not recognized on the theory that there can be no presumed grant except from the owner. In the Easements Act we find in S. 6 that an easement may be for a term of years or for other limited period. In S. 4 it is defined as a right which the owner or occupier of certain land possesses as such. Again in S. 8:

"an easement may be imposed by anyone in the circumstances, and to the extent, in and to which he may transfer his interest in the heritage on which the liability is to be imposed."

Again in S. 11:

"No lessee or other person having a derivative interest may impose on the property held by him as such an easement to take effect after the expiration of his own interest, or in derogation of the right of the lessor or the superior proprietor"

I do not think the word "impose" in these sections must necessarily mean impose by some act, such as a grant, but it will include "impose by omission to take steps to prevent acquisition by prescription." Similarly in Expl. I, S. 15:

"Nothing is an enjoyment within the meaning of this section when it has been had in pursuance of an agreement with the owner or occupier of the property over which the right is claimed, and it is apparent from the agreement that such right has not been granted as an easement, or, if granted as an easement, that it has been granted for a limited period, or subject to a condition on the fulfilment of which it is to cease."

Section 37 says:

"When, from a cause which preceded the imposition of an easement the person by whom it was imposed ceases to have any right in the servient heritage, the easement is extinguished."

All these provisions seem to imply the possibility of an easement being acquired against a lessee or other person having a derivative interest in the property, and the only section which throws some doubt is S. 7 which says:

"Easements are restrictions of one or other of the following rights, namely: (a) The exclusive right of every owner of immovable property . . to enjoy and dispose of the same . . . (b) The right of every owner of immovable property . . . to enjoy without disturbance by another the natural advantages arising from its situation."

This section seems to imply that easements can only be acquired against an owner of property. It does not say that the owner must be the absolute owner, and the following section (S. 8) is inconsistent with such interpretation of the word, for it says that an easement can be imposed to the extent to which any one may transfer his interest in the heritage, which obviously contemplates the existence of a lesser interest than absolute ownership. I think therefore that the word "owner" in S. 7 cannot be interpreted as meaning necessarily absolute owner. The whole scheme of the Act seems to imply that easements can be acquired even against limited owners. The Act undoubtedly goes further than the English law on the subject of prescription, for S. 8 of the English Act. (2 and 3 William 4, C. 71) which corresponds to S. 16, Easements Act, is restricted to rights of way and water, whereas S. 16 of the Indian Act is applicable to all kinds of easements. This is one instance wherein English law has not directly applied in India, and there being this one instance, it is not so difficult to hold that in other respects also the legislature did not wish to adopt all the provisions of the English Common law. If that be so there is no sericus objection to reading the sections, I have enumerated above in a natural meaning, and understanding them as referring to the acquisition of easements against owners who are not absolute. If that is so the easement has at any rate been acquired by the plaintiffs against the defendants, and for the purpose of this suit to which the owners of the land were not parties the plaintiffs would be entitled to an injunction.

I agree therefore that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lakshumanan Chetty and others — Plaintiffs—Appellants.

v.

Chidambaram Chetty — Defendant—Respondent.

Civil Appeal No. 85 of 1917, Decided on 17th October 1918, against decree of Temporary Sub-Judge, Sivaganga, in O. S. No. 13 of 1914.

(a) Contract Act (9 of 1872), S. 196— Agent exceeding his authority— Full disclosure to principal— Objection not pressed— Ratification is to be presumed.

Where an agent enters into a transaction not authorized by his principal, if the agent fully and frankly discloses what he has done and the principal takes no objection or abstains from pressing his objection after hearing the agent's explanations, ratification may readily be presumed. [P 344 C 1, 2]

 (b) Contract Act (9 of 1872), Ss. 196 and 211— Principal must notify his dissent to agent's unauthorized act within reasonable time —Absence of dissent gives presumption of ratification.

Per Wallis, C. J. (Seshagiri Aiyar J., dubitante).—It is the duty of the principal to notify his dissent to the agent within a reasonable time. He has no right to pause and wait the fluctuation of the market in order to ascertain whether the agent's unthorized act is likely to be beneficial or prejudicial; he is bound, if he dissents, to notify his determination in a reasonable time, provided he has an opportunity of doing so. Where the transaction impugned is reported to the principal and he allows it to stand in his accounts for some time without repudiation till the market fluctuates to his disadvantage, he should be deemed to have ratified the transaction and the agent is not liable for the loss : Prince v. Clerk (1823), 1 B. & C. 186, Foll. [P 344 C 2] sized advance against security —Ratification is not implied—Agent is liable for loss.

(c) Contract Act (1872), Ss. 196 and 211— Nattukottai Chetty firm— Agent's unautho-

Per Wallis, C. J.—(Obiter)—When an agent, contrary to instructions, makes advances against security, the principal may realize the security and hold the agent liable for the balance. Such intermeddling will not amount to a ratification of the agent's act. [P 348 C 2]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—The application of principles governing the relationship of English agents to their principals should not be extended to Nattukottai Chetty agents in India. The position of an agent of a Chetty who lends out moneys on his own responsibility approximates to that of a trustee, though not in every detail of it. The whole subject requires reconsideration. [P 351 C 1]

V. Krishnaswamy Aiyar and M. Pantanjali Sastri—for Respondent.

Wallis, C. J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Sivaganga in a suit for an account against their agent, the defendant, in so far as it dismisses the suit in respect of transactions with two persons, E. S. Attia and S. Clifford, which are the subject of issue 5. The Subordinate Judge found that in these transactions the agent exceeded his authority and that his action was not ratified expressly or impliedly by his principals, but held that the fact that the principals took over from the agent certain securities which he had obtained from these two debtors and dealt with some of them amounted to a ratification. Before us Mr. A. Krishnaswami Aiyar, who appeared for the respondent, endeavoured mainly to support the Subordinate Judge's finding on the ground that ratification was proved independently of the subsequent dealings with the securities, and this question has been most elaborately argued before us.

The principals are Nattukottai Chettis who have their permanent home where their families reside in the Madura District and carry on business mostly by agents in various places in India, Burma and the Near East. This is by no means the first case of the kind which has come before this Court. They not infrequently issue very stringent instructions to their agents as to the class of business they should undertake, and the agents not infrequently take an elastic view of the restrictions imposed upon them and embark from various motives on unauthorized transactions. In such cases, if the agent fully and frankly discloses what he has done, as it is his duty to do under his contract which is one of the utmost good faith, and if the principal takes no objection or abstains from pressing his objection after hearing the agent's explanations, ratification may readily be presumed. In Prince v. Clerk (1) Abbott, C. J., laid down that it was the duty of the principal to notify his dissent to the agent within a reasonable time and Holroyd, J., said that the question was whether the principal assented to the act done by the agent which might or might not be beneficial. And if the inference arising from the facts was that he decided to take the cargo on his own account or that he meant at least to take the chance of the market, that would be sufficient to discharge the agent. So too Bayley, J., observed that:

> "the principal . . . has no right to pause and wait the fluctuation of the market, in order to ascertain whether the purchase is likely to be beneficial or prejudicial; he is bound, if he dissents to notify his determination in a reasonable time, provided he has an opportunity of doing so."

The same principles, in my opinion, are applicable in the present case and if the principals decided not to press their objections but to wait and see how the transactions turned out, that would be sufficient to discharge the agent.

The question has to be decided mainly on the correspondence which is practically all of it, produced by the plaintiffs, as the defendant returned to his principals the letters he had received from them or left them behind at Rangoon with his successor. It is incomplete, and it was suggested to us that some of the plaintiff's own letters to the defendant had been kept back by them, or had even been rewritten. The Subordinate Judge found some of the letters exhibited not proved, but in view of the fact that they were not cross-examined too, we think the letters exhibited may be accepted as genuine; but, as will be pointed out there is some ground for thinking that they have been selected with a view to help the plaintiff's case. Further the plaintiffs have not produced the kurippus or monthly statements of transactions sent them by the defendant, of the Paredu or ledger which they admit having written up for a time from these kurippus as received. They no doubt say they afterwards discontinued this practice for no apparent reason; nor have they produced the aindugais or more detailed statements showing the state of each constituent's accounts which were forwarded to them. P. W. 3 in his evidence only complains that the defendant stopped sending this about a year before he returned from Rangoon, which was in 1911. Ex. 1 (b), dated 26th August 1909, shows an aindugai had just then been sent. Ex. J-24, dated 2nd January 1911, is the first complaint of the aindugai not being sent:

"In spite of your having been told for the last four or five months to send the aindugai you have not sent it."

This does not look as if no aindugai had been received since May 1910 which is the material date here, but I do not attach very much importance to this as I am not satisfied that the plaintiffs did not write up their paredu, which they have not produced, from the kurippus which were regularly sent them, and I have come to the conclusion that they knew more of the real state of the transactions than they are now willing to admit. No doubt, in Ex. J-24 in January 1911 they stated that they supposed the whole of the oil share transactions were then closed but I doubt if this was serious. They would thus appear to have suppressed some of their accounts and they have not put Alagappa Chetty, the agent who succeeded the defendant at Rangoon, into the box: and these facts must be taken seriously into account in considering whether or not the correspondence shows their assent. Again, to form a right conclusion on the correspondence it must be read consecutively and as a whole. Mere isolated sentences taken out of their context and used without reference to the date of the letter in which they occur may be very misleading. The main question is whether the plaintiffs assented to the defendant's advancing large sums to one Attia and one Clifford on the security of certain oil shares between November 1908 and May 1910. There were also large transactions with Mawer & Co. of the same kind which have not resulted in loss and as to which therefore no claim is made. Mawer who is best known to the public in connexion with the losses sustained by Indian depositors owing to failure of the Bank of Burma, half of which he owned according to one of the letters, was also largely interested, as was the bank, in certain oil companies which he had been instrumental in bringing out. Attia and Clifford are said by P. W. 3 to have been Mawer's partners. As already stated, there were large transactions with him, but the transactions now in question were entered into by Attia and Clifford on their individual accounts.

One of the earliest letters, Ex. J-28, dated 7th January 1908, from the senior partner of the plaintiffs' firm, now deceased, shows that the plaintiffs were fully alive to the risk involved in advancing money against shares. Many of the letters addressed to the defendant in 1908 were in the nature of general instructions rather than positive orders. Ex. 2 (e) tells the defendant not to lend on hundis without security. Ex. 2 (f) modifies this. Ex. J-21, dated 2nd September 1908, tells the defendant to confine himself mainly to getting in outstanding debts, and Ex. J-7, dated 3rd November 1908, is to the same effect. Ex. K-2, dated 11th November 1908, from plaintiff 3 complains of the defendant's disregard of their instructions and threatens that, if he lends in contravention of instructions, he shall answer for every pie. Ex. J-11 reports that Attia's hundis had been taken against a deposit of shares, as could be seen by the ledger, and that the defendant was making frequent inquiries about the value of the shares. If they fell, the money could be collected gradually. This put the plaintiffs on notice of the transaction so far. Ex. J 26, dated 14th December 1908, shows the plaintiff's attention had already been called to transactions with Attia as they directed that the money due from him should be called in. Ex. L, dated 24th December 1908, is a reply from the defendant urging that Attia was a good constituent and it would be better to go on dealing with him. In Ex. J-29, dated 11th January 1909, the plaintiffs' senior partner inquired why Attia had not paid interest for a long time.

Ex. J-2, dated 19th January 1909, is a general instruction to get in debts outstanding on simple bonds, shares and hundis. In Ex. J-12, dated 21st January 1909, which crossed it, the defendant reported that Attia's hundis were being renewed as his shares were of great value. The plaintiffs seem to have accepted the situation so far; but Ex. J-8, dated 30th March 1909, complained of the sale on which the defendant was doing business and told him not to lend any more.

The next reference to Attia is Ex. K-4, dated 14th June 1909, when the plaintiff inquired why the defendant had to take up Attia's hundi if he was such a sound constituent. In Ex. J-13, dated 17th June 1909, the defendant gave his reasons for thinking Attia a sound constituent, and that it was advantageous to the plaintiffs to deal with him. In Ex. J-4, dated 29th June 1909, he was asked why Attia borrowed from them if as, the defendant stated, he could borrow at 6 per cent, from the bank. Ex. J-27, dated 26th July 1909, mentioned that people from Rangoon had been expressing alarm at the way the defendant was managing the business. In Ex. J-16, dated 29th July 1909, the defendant replied that it was going on well enough. Ex. J-18, dated 3rd August 1909, complained that he was going on lending and asks when was this to stop. We now come to 12th August 1909. The day-book, with which the monthly kurippus sent to the plaintiffs corresponded, shows that Attia's account was then balanced, but that this was partly effected by discounting his hundi with the bank; and the defendant in his evidence admits that he had to take it up on 23rd September 1909. It is in respect of the fresh commitments between this date and April 1910 that it has been endeavoured to make the agent responsible, and it is necessary to see in what circumstances these fresh advances were made. We are not so much concerned with the respective attitudes of the agents and the principals before this time, as with the question whether the transactions which followed between September 1909 and August 1910 were brought to the knowledge of the plaintiffs and assented to by them. There were fresh debts of Rupees 5,000 on 27th August and of Rs. 10,000 on 17th September in respect of which shares were deposited, and by 9th December the balance shown as due by Attia was Rs. 26,300, which rose by 7th April 1910 to Rs. 93,644-3-8.

Just at the most important period the correspondence produced by the plaintiffs becomes curiously meagre and incomplete. The only letters from September 1909 to February 1910 which have been exhibited are Exs. 2 (c), L-15, 3, 1 (c). They do not appear to contain any reference to Attia, whereas Ex. 1 (c) expressly prohibits advances to certain other persons. The next letter dealing with Attia and Mawer is Ex. J 17, dated 28th March 1910, from the defendant. It deals at length with the advances to Mawer and Attia, and urges various matters which it says the plaintiffs do not take into consideration. It is clearly in answer to a letter from the plaintiffs which the plaintiffs, who as I said, are in possession of the letters written by them to the defendant, have not chosen to produce. They were getting kurippus as usual from September to the end of March showing the transactions with Attia, and I have no doubt they were the subject of letters which have not been produced. Ex. 3 (a), dated 4th April 1910, in which the receipt of the kurippu sent on 11th March is acknowledged, is an answer to a letter not produced and inquires how they are to realize the shares deposited, which may be taken to include the shares, etc., deposited by Attia and Clifford as well as those deposited by Mawer. This is explained by the defendant in Ex. 1 (l), dated 15th April 1910. The answer to Ex. J.-17 is the 3rd plaintiff's letter Ex. K-5, dated 19th April 1910. After urging the defendant not to make fresh commitments as his successor would be coming and might not agree to take them over he concludes:

> "I have read all you have written about Mawer and E.S. Attia. People here say Attia is a cheat and Mawer a leaky vessel in many ways."

The defendant's answer is Ex. 1 (d), dated 29th April 1910. He says Mawer's and Attia's loans are secured and that it is necessary to oblige them with small loans and that if he refused they would not be prepared to leave such amply security. This letter certainly does not explain the large advance of Rs. 30,000 on 1st, April but we have to see what followed. On 1st April the debit balance stood at Rs. 93,644. The subsequent transactions were in the nature of renewals and the ultimate balance was Rupees 83,000 odd secured by a large number of shares. Ex. J-23, dated 27th Chittrai (9th May 1910), acknowledges the receipt of the kurippu for last month, that is of Panguni, the month preceding Chittrai, which must have included the Rs. 30,000 transactions just mentioned, and merely says it is not desirable to go on giving more and more. It also comments on the fact that Attia had not been able to take up and pay from the thavanai hundi which was paid by the defendant and debited against him on 25th of the month, apparently the debit in the accounts of 14th April for the thavanai hundi of Rs. 2,000. In his reply, Ex. L 6, dated 19th May 1910, the defendant says that as Attia's securities were so much in excess it was necessary to cash his hundis. Exs. L-4 and L-5 again are letters from the defendant to the third plaintiff in reply to letters of 7th June and 19th July which the plaintiffs have not chosen to produce. The missing letters would be very material as to the firm's attitude with regard to the secured loans to Mawer and Attia. In Ex. L-4 the defendant merely says there is no reason for being nervous about the accounts, and in Ex. L-5 that the dealings with Mawer and Attia are going on regularly. Mawer, who had been alluded to as the leaky ship, he says, was paying cash, and the transactions with him were closed without any loss.

As I have said the transactions to which objection was taken in argument before us took place between September 1909 and April 1910. In the light of the correspondence which the plaintiffs have produced which moreover is incomplete and contains very significant omissions, I cannot find that the plaintiffs ever intimated up to end of the year 1910 that they were not prepared to be bound by the transactions which had been brought to their knowledge and I think they must be taken to have assented to them. The exact state of the accounts might have been ascertained by writing up the paredu from the kurippus sent to them. They admittedly used to do so. They have given no explanation why they ceased, and have not produced the paredu wich they admit having maintained for a time and I am not satisfied that they gave up the practice of writing up the Paredu as they now pretend. My impression is they were persuaded somewhat reluctantly to accept the policy of making advances against these oil shares. If this conclusion be not correct, I can only say that the plaintiffs have themselves to blame. The defendant cannot be considered to have been their only source of information as to their shares. There were plenty of other Nattukottai Chetties living near who carried on business through agents in Rangoon and this oil speculation must have been a source of frequent conversation among them and the state of the market must have been well known to the Chetties in Madura. No further correspondence between plaintiffs and defendant is produced about Attia till the end of the year 1910. There is a letter of 4th August 1910 from defendant to one Kandanur, who was apparently wanted to influence the defendant's successor as to the terms on which he should take over. It contains the false statement that all Attia's debt had been paid in cash. The plaintiffs apparently did not see this and certainly were not deceived by it. If Attia had cleared off his debt the credits in his favour would have appeared in the monthly kurippus, which were admittedly forwarded to the plaintiffs. The case would be altogether different if the defendant sent false kurippus suppressing these transactions but the plaintiffs might easily have proved this and established their case by producing the kurippus sent them. They have neither produced them nor accounted for their failure to do so and in these circumstances I cannot come to the conclusion that these transactions were kept back from them. There was further correspondence about defendant coming back Ex. 7, dated 28th October 1910 and Ex. 1 (f) dated 19th November 1910, but no further letters about Attia are produced though I cannot help thinking there must have been some. In Ex. 1 (f) the defendant writes that the withdrawal of Rs. 75,000 had occasioned difficulties and concludes:

"you are not to set up that all the moneys recovered were lent under your directions and that all that remains outstanding was lent on my responsibility."

Exhibit J-24, dated 2nd January 1911, complains that the plaintiffs had been asking for the aindugai for four months and observes: "I suppose no oil transactions are open." The monthly kurippus cannot have suggested this. Possibly they had heard that the oil shares were unsteady. Ex. F, dated 3rd February 1911, which is an answer to the defendant's letter Ex. 1 (f) dated 19th November 1910, answers the statement by the defendant in that letter that the profit and loss was theirs and says that every one knows that, so that at that time they were not thinking of holding the defendant liable for his advances on the security of the oil shares. It also contains the first express allusion to the fall in the value of the shares and observes that the people:

"who owe us money on shares say they cannot realize as the shares are low and that they will sell and pay when the price is to their advantage."

This shows that the plaintiffs were following the market in Rangoon. There are more complaints of the failure to send the aindugai, and the plaintiffs' case is that owing to this failure they were kept in the dark as to the extent of the commitments but they had all along been receiving the monthly kurippus containing the entries of debits and credits and I cannot accept this contention especially in view of their failure to produce the kurippus sent them the paredu they admit having written up from it for a time and the incomplete state of the correspondence they have chosen to produce. The transactions questioned before us were between September 1909 and April 1910 and the plaintiffs must be taken to have been informed of them within a month or six weeks by the monthly kurippus. It was only after the shares had fallen and the defendant had reported the difficulty of getting Attia to pay in Ex. 1-J, dated 16th March 1911, and Ex. 1-k, dated 27th March 1911, that the plaintiffs in Ex. E on 12th April 1911 took occasion on the arrival of the aindugai to say that they did not know that Rs. 85,000 was due by Attia and Rs. 27,000 by Clifford. On the whole I cannot agree with the Subordinate Judge that the plaintiffs did not assent to the transactions between September 1909 and April 1910 which have been impeached before us. He has not dealt with the letters in chronological order in the light of the information which the plaintiffs must be taken to have had when writing nor has he noticed the significant lacunae.

The plaintiffs and the defendant are each anxious to escape the loss and their oral evidence is unreliable. Taking the correspondence which has been produced in the light of the information of which the plaintiffs were admittedly in possession and having regard to the fact that all the material letters which should be in the plaintiffs' custody are not before us and to the fact that they have kept back the kurippus and paredus I think the evidence is sufficient to warrant an inference from their silence for many months that they assented to the transactions in question. The loss appears to have resulted from the fall in the value of the shares at the beginning of 1911 and I am not satisfied that the defendant has been shown to have been guilty of subsequent neglect or misconduct as regards the recovery of the debts outstanding at this period. The evidence as to what happened in Rangoon before he returned and as to a certain portion of Attia's debt having been taken over by his successor Alagappa is incomplete and the plaintiffs have not called Alagappa.

On the foregoing grounds I think the appeal fails. If I had been able to accept the Subordinate Judge's finding that the transactions were not ratified expressly or impliedly until the plaintiffs intermeddled with the securities taken from Attia and Clifford I should have been unable to agree with the Subordinate Judge's conclusion that such intermeddling amounted to a ratification. Story says that when an agent contrary to instructions makes advances against security the principal may realize the security and hold the agent liable for the balance. The arguments addressed to us have altogether failed to persuade me that this is not good law as well as good sense but the point does not arise and it is unnecessary to discuss it further.

My conclusion on the main question rests on the conclusion to which I have been compelled to come in the present state of the evidence that the transactions which are now impugned were reported to the principals as they occurred in the monthly kurippus and that they were allowed to stand without repudiation in their accounts for many months until the shares began to fall. I quite appreciate what my learned brother has written about the difficulties of Nattukottai Chetties in dealing with their agents but the fact that they are very much in the hands of these agents and are afraid of offending them lest worse befall, affords no sufficient reason in my opinion for abstaining from applying to them the principles laid down by Lord Tenterden and other eminent Judges in Prince v. Clark (1). The present case appears to me to suggest two lessons for Nattukottai Chetties in the position of the plaintiffs', one that they should promptly disavow transactions entered into on their behalf by their agents in excess of instructions and the other that if their case is that the agents have deceived and misled them by suppressing facts they should put the Court in a position to judge whether this was so or not by putting before the Court the documents containing the information actually supplied to them by the agents. The appeal is dismissed but without costs. The memorandum of objections is also dismissed.

Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—The correspondence relating to the case has been set out very fully in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice which I had the advantage of reading before writing mine. I do not propose to deal with the whole of it again. As in my opinion the conduct of the defendant has not been straightforward I propose to refer to the main features of the case although I do not differ from the conclusion arrived at by my Lord. The defendant was appointed agent in February 1907.

He had under his salary chit only three years to serve. His business was to take up the collection of the moneys lent by his predecessor the retiring agent and to lend out moneys to the best advantage of his principal. Ordinarily at the end of the three years the defendant was bound to have closed his accounts and after settling the valuation in the presence of mediators with the incoming agent to have handed over the balance sheet to the latter and to have come back to British India to render a full account of his stewardship. Therefore during the last year of his agency the outgoing agent is not expected to grant fresh loans to constituents. If this practice of agents transacting business is kept in mind, it will be seen that the defendant in this case did not act honestly in advancing fresh loans like the ones with which we are concerned. It is common ground that the dealings with Attia were originally closed in August 1909. By this time the defendants had been 2½ years in Rangoon, and in 6 months' time he was bound to return to Madras and to render an account. Even before August 1909 the defendant was warned that he should not lend to Attia on personal security. In Ex. J-26 written on 15th December 1908, referring to Attia the plaintiff 1 wrote:

"Collect in full from customer No 53 and let there be no balance. . . . . If you act without attending to instructions, it would amount to disobedience of written orders."

In reply to that the defendant wrote Ex. L on 24th December 1908, in which he said:

"The two persons (referring to Attia) are one and the same person. All that he owes to our two shops are covered by securities. He is a little slippery person. The security is worth much."

It is necessary to explain that there were two shops in Rangoon belonging to the principals, one known as Chinna Kadai and the other known as Peria Kadai. There is evidence that in Chinna Kadai the defendant had a share in addition to being an agent. In January 1909 the principal asked the defendant (Ex. J-29) why interest has not been paid by individual No. 53 for a long time. It also cautioned him against renewing Hundis. In Ex. J-12, dated 21st January 1909, the defendant replied saying that Attia's Hundis were being renewed because his securities were good. On 30th March 1909 plaintiff 3 wrote Ex. J-8 to the defendant that he should not lend any more money because "it was his duty to make up his accounts and not embark on fresh transactions."

It must be mentioned that the plaintiffs had, from the outset, been very suspicious about the dealings of the defendant. As early as November 1908 plaintiff 3 wrote Ex. K-2 to the defendant in very strong terms against his reckless advances and informed him that he was bringing the name of the firm into disrepute. On 15th April 1909 plaintiff 3 again wrote to the defendant (Ex. J-22) in these terms:

"Moreover it is two and a quarter years since you went there. Heareafter you should engage yourself only in the work of collection, but if you were to be advancing more and more, things would get beyond control and our business would suffer."

The letter said further that the principals intended to send an agent even within the period of his agency, but "as the defendant had not got the business under control" they were delaying sending a new agent. On 23rd April 1909 the same principal wrote to the defendant (vide Ex. K-3):

"You should as strictly as possible collect from all constituents excepting the one constituent, namely the man of Kuthaya. In future you should not lend even a pie to constituents."

On 11th May 1909 plaintiff wrote Ex. J-3 in which he asked the defendant to close up his accounts as early as possible and make it possible for a new agent being sent out at once. On 11th May 1909 plaintiff 3 wrote Ex. J-9 in which he stated:

"People say that the securities on which you have lent out money are all weak and insufficient . . . . . It seems to us as if you do not care to follow our instructions."

On 8th June 1909 plaintiff 1 wrote Ex. K-1 in which he sarcastically referred to Attia's soundness of credit and asked the defendant not to honour his Hundis. To these various warnings against lending to Attia the defendant replied by Ex. J-13 on 17th June 1909 in which he stated.

"It is our good luck that E. S. Attia has come and joined us as our friend."

On 14th July 1909 plaintiff 3 wrote to the defendant (vide Ex. K-7);

"Although we may write to you ever so much it is very painful to us to see that although you receive them all you go on making further payments without recovering anything from Enams and keep sending Kurippu accounts."

On 29th July 1909 plaintiff 1 wrote to the defendant Ex. J-27 wherein he said :

"If you would from this moment not advance a pie to any constituent, but make all the necessary endeavours to collect and curtail and close business, there would on the whole be a good name for you and a good name for us too . . . . . The only request I make is that you should arrange to make collections soon before the substitute arrives."

At about the same time plaintiff 3 wrote [vide Ex. 7 (a)] :

"A bad report has spread here that your agency business is very extensive and that the transactions are very unsound. More than two years of your period has expired. In future you should curtail business and pay up dues and close accounts."

On 20th July the defendant wrote to plaintiff 3 (vide Ex. J-16) :

"We are carrying on our dealings here well enough. There is no confusion of any kind."

On 3rd August 1909 plaintiff 1 wrote (Ex. J-18): "You still continue to give loans on shares. It is not known when this is to stop." The correspondence to which I have referred shows that the plaintiffs were very anxious that the defendant should not grant fresh loans, that the defendant should wind up the business and that particularly he should have no further dealings with Attia. It is with full knowledge of this attitude of the plaintiff that the defendant began fresh transactions with Attia between September 1909 and April 1910. I shall refer to only a very few letters of this period as the learned Chief Justice has gone into the correspondence of this period at great length, and then state my conclusions ; in my opinion also the full correspondence of this period has not been placed before the Court and the blame for not having placed all the materials before the Court must rest on the plaintiffs. The general attitude of the plaintiffs may be gathered from Ex. K-5 written by plaintiff 3 on 20th April 1910 in which he stated :

"I have read all that is written about company and Attia. They say that Attia is a cheat and the company is a leaky vessel."

Prior to this letter the defendant had written on 28th March 1910 (Ex. J-17) in which he stated :

"Mawer & Co , Attia and Clifford and others have mortgaged shares to us . . . . . we should keep on the good side of them by frequently saying that they were given to us in trust . . . . . while the state of affairs here is like this, some one has spread a false rumour there."

Exhibit K-5 may be taken to be a reply to this. In Ex. L-1 the defendant assured the plaintiffs that the loans made to Mawer & Co. and others were on good security. On 29th April 1910 the defendant wrote Ex. I (d) :

"As E. S. Attia and Mawer & Co., and others hold share mortgages and as thavanai money is being received for the said hundis, we have to accommodate them when they apply for small loans If we refuse to give they would want to have the share mortgages. The securities are in excess."

We have further letters from the defendant Exs. L (3), L (6) and L (17), which were intended to assure the plaintiffs that everything was being properly done. In reply to Ex. 1 (d) plaintiff 1 wrote Ex. J-23 on 9th May 1910 :

"In the case of E. S. Attia, if you keep saying that the mortgage loans can be recovered sooner or later, when is it to be recovered ? It is not desirable to give more and more. . . . . you have represented him to be a person of a very high status. It does not appear that his credit will continue to the end."

To this the defendant replied in Ex. L (6) on 19th May 1910 :

"As the security of Attia is in excess of the sum of the hundis we do renew them occasionally."

In this way matters went on. The plaintiffs in their native place felt helpless against the defendant who was conducting business as he liked disregarding positive injunctions from the principals. It was said that the attitude of the plaintiffs was that of persons sitting on a fence. It is difficult to see what could have been done; his instant dismissal coupled with the coming of a new agent might have been the correct procedure, but that would have precipitated matters or might have caused the plaintiffs' heavy loss. It must be said that Nattukottai Chetties do not clearly appreciate the duty they owe to themselves and to their agents. They repose the greatest confidence in the good faith of their agents and permit them to deal with their monies as if they were the owners and not simply agents. The idea that if they wanted to hold the agents liable they should at once repudiate the transaction has apparently not occurred to them yet. Moreover the transactions are not of such a simple nature as could easily be affirmed or disaffirmed.

The agents are expected to lend out monies to numerous constituents. They are not like ordinary agents whose cases have been considered in England in the various decisions quoted before us. These latter, generally speaking, were commissioned to conduct particular businesses. In such cases repudiation is easy. In my opinion, the application of principles governing the relationship of English agents to their principals should not be extended to Chetty agents in India. The agent of a Chetty is practically the principal. He lends out monies. He is entitled to sue to recover them. Under these circumstances the position of a Chetty agent approximates to that of a trustee. I do not say that every consideration relating to transactions between a trustee and the cestuique trust should apply. But I am doubtful whether it is desirable to import into questions of this nature rules governing the relationship of principal and agent in England. In Ramasawy Chetty v. Karuppan Chetty (2), such principles have been applied in the case of Chetty agents. I think the whole subject requires re-consideration. S. 211, Contract Act suggests that if the directions of the principal are disregarded the loss consequent upon such conduct must be made good by the agent to the principal.

Further, I feel convinced that the defendant has kept back information and has not acted towards his principal in a straightforward manner. The repeated requests of the principal that the aindugais should be sent have been ignored by the defendant. The last but one aindugai was sent on 15th August 1909. The final one was sent on 15th March 1911. Between these periods there is no excuse for the defendant not having sent the aindugais. In his evidence the defendant admitted that he did not send aindugais even after repeated requests. He says in one of his letters that it would have taken him a long time to make up the aindugai. When we remember that the defendant was a near relation of the plaintiffs and that the plaintiffs informed him that he should not take advantage of the relationship and should conduct himself as an agent and not as nephew, the conduct of the defendant in disobeying the express instructions and advancing new loans appears to be reprehensible. But for the fact that the plaintiffs have not produced all the kurippus sent to them and to the fact that they have kept back Alagappa Chetty from the witness box, I would have felt inclined, notwithstanding the decisions to the contrary, to hold that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence and that no ratification ought to be implied from the failure to expressly repudiate the transactions. Having regard to the view taken by the learned Chief Justice and to the authorities in this Court and in England, I do not propose to differ from the judgment just delivered. I hope that our conclusions would have the effect of opening the eyes of Chetty principals to the necessity of observing greater caution in their dealings with their agents, and to their exercising greater scrutiny over their doings. I agree, though not without hesitation, that the appeal should be dismissed. The memorandum of objections should also be dismissed.

Malabar Law—Kanom—Grant by one of two trustees without consent of other is invalid — Application of kanom amount to discharge liability on trust property—Kanomdar has charge.

C. Madhavan Nair—for Respondents.

Judgment.—Before disposing of these appeals, we ought to have a clear finding from the lower appellate Court as to whether defendant 2 consented to the kanom being granted to the appellants although he did not join in its execution. Both parties will be allowed to adduce fresh evidence on this point. One month will be allowed for the submission of the finding and seven days for objections.

Finding.—I am directed by the High Court to submit a finding on the following issue, viz.:—

"Whether defendant 2 consented to the kanom being granted to the appellants although he did not join in its execution."

There appears to be a mistake in the wording of the issue. It is no one's case that any kanom was granted to appellants. The kanom in question is one granted by defendant 1 to appellants' assignor. I shall assume that the words "to the appellants" in the issue have been written by a slip for "to the appellants' assignor," and shall submit my finding on that assumption. No fresh evidence has been adduced for plaintiffs or for defendant 3. For defendant 2 only some documenary evidence has been produced to show that in other transactions defendant 1 acted without defendant 2. I do not think that this additional evidence is of any real help in the present case. What happened in respect of the transaction now in question must be decided on the oral evidence on record. After hearing arguments again on that evidence I see no reason to differ from my original conclusion that the evidence of defendants 1 and 4 must be accepted in preference to that of defendant 2. What the evidence of defendants 1 and 4 amounts to is that defendant 2 at first consented to the proposal that the money required should be raised by granting a kanom to defendant 4, but that before the date of execution he had changed his mind and was against it. According to the evidence of defendants 1 and 4 they were not even under the impression on the date of execution that defendant 2 still consented to the transaction. It is not their case that the kanom was executed with a subsisting consent from defendant 2, though he did not actually join in it. At the time of execution it is clear that there was no subsisting consent from defendant 2. And further the evidence of defendants 1 and 4 is that defendant 2 agreed to join in executing a kanom-deed in favour of defendant 4 for the purpose of raising the money required. But there is nothing to show that he ever consented to the details of the transaction. On the contrary defendant 1 says: "The Purappad, etc., were determined when the draft was being prepared," which was sometime after his last interview with defendant 2 before the date of execution and as he says, after he had learnt that defendent 2 was in collusion with defendant 3. So what we arrive at is that defendant 2 consented to the project of raising money from defendant 4 on a kanom but never consented to the details of the transaction and at the date of execution was no longer consenting to the project. My finding is that defendant 2 never consented to the particular kanom in question being granted to appellants' assignor and at the time when the kanom deed was executed was not consenting to any kanom being granted to appellants' assignor. I regret that I did not make the position clearer in my original judgment.

(After return of findings the Court delivered the following)

Judgment.—The learned District Judge has found that one of the co-uralans did not give his consent to the grant of the kanom in question. But it is argued that nevertheless the act of one trustee, if he has consulted the other trustee as to the grant of a mortgage or any similar transaction and that trustee wrongly refused to join in the act, was valid. There is no express authority dealing with the case of two trustees, though there are a number of cases in which it has been held that where there are a number of trustees the act of the majority will be binding and valid if they had given a proper opportunity to the other trustees to consider the advisability of the act in question. But the decision are based on the principle that unless the act of the majority was upheld in many cases the trust estate would suffer. In the case of two trustees however this principle will not apply because there is no majority. That is what is practically indicated in Savitri Antarjanam v. Raman Nambudri (1). The decision in Wilkinson v. Malin (2), which is the leading case on the subject, bases it on the principle that the majority should have approved of the act. We do not think that we should be warranted in extending the principle to a case like the present where only one out of two trustees has exercised an act which ought to be done by both the trustees jointly.

But it is pointed out that the suit ought not to have been dismissed altogether and that the plaintiff should have a charge for the amount actually advanced by him as it went to discharge a liability on some of the trust properties including the property in the suit. We think there is force in this contention, and we therefore modify the decree of the lower Court by declaring a charge on the property in suit for the amount of Rs. 418-14-0. This appellants will bear the costs of this appeal.

Judgment.—23 persons were convicted by the Sessions Judge of Coimbatore of the offences of rioting, grievous hurt and other allied offences. Of these, some have appealed to us and we will have to deal with the case of each of them separately. Information was given on 19th May last year at the Annur Police Station of a theft committed in the house of a Valayan. It appears that the police searched the houses of some persons within the limits of the police station and then on the 20th in the morning the Sub-Inspector, P.W.1, along with some constables and others came to a village called Molakalipalayam which is within the jurisdiction of the Sulur Police Station. Molakalipalayam is about two or three miles from Annur. There the houses of some of the Goundans were searched and in the house of accused 20, who, it may be mentioned, has not preferred any appeal, a cloth was found which was identified as part of the stolen property. The man was arrested and kept in custody. Some of the Goundans of that village and of a neighbouring village balled Valayapalayam are alleged to have remonstrated with the police against searching Goundans' houses, but the Sub-Inspector would not listen to them. He apparently had some information about the stolen property and he was not to be deterred from what he considered his duty to search in those villages for the stolen property.

Accused 20 was kept at Molakalipalayam in the custody of two police constables and the Sub Inspector along with other policemen went on to Valayapalayam. There can be no doubt upon the evidence that his intention was to investigate the case and to search some houses where he had information that the stolen property was concealed. The Goundans of the locality, according to the evidence, were much excited. They raised strong objections to the police searching Goundans' houses. Accused 1, the Karnam of Mopperipalayam, and accused 21 the Village Magistrate of the same place, who were sent for, were present at Valayapalayam and they were appealed to by the police to help them in making the search. What their actual conduct on the occasion was, is one of the points for consideration in their case. The case for the prosecution is that they not only refused to render help to the police, but abetted the Goundan villagers in assaulting them and preventing them from carrying out any search in Valayapalayam. A large crowd of about 300 people gathered there. Accused 2 and 8, who are said to be prominent villagers, joined in the protest, and the mob did not allow the police to search any of the houses there. The police were attacked and beaten. They tried to frighten the mob by firing one or two shots in the air, but the mob was in a truculent mood and attacked and beat the police. The Sub-Inspector ran away to a place called Muthugoundanputhur, which is in the same direction as the Annur Station, from Valayapalayam. There he took shelter in a house, but the mob followed him, dragged him out of the house, put him in a jutka and having disabled the pony of the jutka, dragged the jutka with the Sub-Inspector to a temple at Valayapalayam and kept him there. On the way the mob seems to have tilted the Sub-Inspector out of the cart several times purposely as if he was, to use the language of the Sessions Judge, so much rubbish. One or two constables were also taken to the temple and kept there. That, broadly speaking, is the outline of the case for the prosecution. The policemen were all very severely handled and the Sub-Inspector was mercilessly beaten. One of his legs was broken. He had a number of injuries on his head and suffered apparently from concussion of the brain. He was nearly for three weeks in the hospital and was not able to speak rationaliy for some days. Some of the police constables also received severe beating. Some Valayans belonging to the complainant's party were also beaten and one of them bore a severe injury. Information being given as to what had happened, reinforcements came from the Annur Police Station and the injured policemen were rescued.

It ought also to be mentioned that on the same day, an old man called Sellappa Goundan was murdered. The evidence as to how and under what circumstances this man came to be murdered is not very full, and it is not possible, upon such evidence as there is, to find who was responsible for his death. It appears to have been suggested on behalf of the prosecution that the accused or their friends deliberately killed the old man in order to make out a case against the police. On the other hand, the defence seems to have suggested that Sellappa Goundan was attacked by a number of men, about 30 in number, probably belonging to the police party. The Sessions Judge was unable upon the evidence placed before him to fix the responsibility for the death of Sellappa Goundan on either party or on any of the persons concerned in this case. In his opinion it might have been an incident quite apart from the main riot or it might have been a deliberate act done by the accused in order to shift the blame for the occurrence on to the police; and we must say that we are unable to come to any more definite conclusion with respect to this most unfortunate incident. We do not even know what investigation was carried out and what attempts were made to find out who was responsible for this murder.

To come back to the case before us the defence of the accused on the merits apparently was that the police headed by the Sub-Inspector, P. W. 1, went on the night of the 19th to the village of Valayapalayam and looted the houses of some Valayans and committed rioting. P. W. 1 is charged with having been drunk and in fact with having run amok. It is said that he repeated the same conduct on the 20th. But there cannot be any doubt that the finding of the Sessions Judge that this story is not made out by any evidence worth mentioning is correct. If there was truth in this defence one would have expected that abundant evidence would have been forthcoming to prove the charge which is a very serious charge, against P. W. 1 and the other policemen concerned. Some of the defence witnesses do give some vague evidence on the point but none of them profess to give any particulars upon which a definite finding could be based. Similarly in the cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution, this story was hardly put to them. One or two stray questions were asked some of the witnesses suggesting that the police were acting illegally and aggressively in the village of Valayápalayam. But the attempt to elicit any facts from the prosecution witnesses which would support the defence in this connexion is absolutely faint hearted and we cannot place the least reliance upon such evidence for the defence as has been adduced in this connexion. No doubt this was the story which accused 3 and 17 told the Village Magistrate of Mopperipalayam and got embodied in the report Ex. 13. But there also the statements are vague to the extreme and Ex. 13 bears internal testimony of this story being a concoction.

Before dealing with the evidence we ought to deal with the question of law which was raised in the case namely, whether there has been a misjoinder of charges. The charges are with reference to the occurrence at Valayapalayam and Muthugoundanputhur and also what happened in the afternoon at Molakalipalayam in the matter of the rescue of accused 20. There is no charge with respect to anything that was done by the accused persons at Molakalipalayam in the morning. The contention is that there were three separate occurrences and that they could not be the subject of charge in one and the same trial. The whole question rests on whether the occurrence on the 20th as alleged by the prosecution, amounted to one transaction within the meaning of S. 235, Criminal P. C., that is to say whether the series of acts charged against the accused were so connected together as to form the same transaction. If they formed one transaction there can be no doubt that the charges were rightly joined. As to the scope and interpretation of S. 235, the matter was considered recently by a Bench of this Court in Choragudi Venkatadri v. Emperor (1). There it is pointed out that it is hardly possible to lay down in abstract terms which would be any more definite than the language of the section itself what would amount to one and the same transaction. Each case must depend upon its own facts the general test being whether the acts charged were so connected together as to amount to one transaction. The connexion in some cases would have to be sought in a common purpose running through all the acts or in the nature of the occurrence having regard to the cause and the time and the place It is pointed out in Choragudi Venkatadri v. Emperor (1) that the effect of the decision on S. 235 is that at least in a certain class of cases —the case there under consideration being one of them—

"community of purpose or design and continuity of action are essential elements of the connexion necessary to link together different acts into one and the same transaction."

This proposition, be it noted, was not intended to cover all cases and this is expressly mentioned. Then it goes on:

"In such cases the acts alleged to be connected with each other must have been done in pursuance of a particular end in view and as accessory thereto or perhaps as suggested by the circumstances in which the acts in pursuance of the original design were done and in close proximity of time to those acts. But mere community of purpose is not sufficient; there must also be continuity of action."

It is laid down in Emperor v. Sherufalli (2), which was accepted in Choragudi Venkatadri v. Emperor (1) by this Court as enunciating the proper test:

"The real and substantial test then, for determining whether several offences are connected together so as to form the same transaction depends upon whether they are so related to one another in point of purpose, or as cause and effect, or as principal and subsidiary acts, as to constitute one continuous action."

Here the acts relied upon by the prosecution were undoubtedly such as to constitute one continuous action. It was argued that the objects of the unlawful assembly at the three different places were different, and it is pointed out that some of the accused persons took part in the occurrence at one place and some at another place. The fallacy running through the argument is that where there has been an occurrence of this nature, we must take the specific common object of each unlawful assembly mentioned in the charge as conclusive of the question whether, if there was more than one riot in the course of an occurrence, they could all be tried together. I do not think this is what was intended to be laid down either in Choragudi v. Venkatadri v. Emperor (1) or Emperor v. Sherufalli (2). Here the purpose which connects the occurrences in all the three villages was to prevent the police by force from searching the Goundan's houses and to punish them if they dared to do so. Whether in pursuance of such a purpose some of the rioters had in view one specific unlawful object at one place and some other of the rioters pursued a different object at another place would make no difference, so long as the different assemblies participated in the one purpose of preventing police officers from searching Goundans' houses in connexion with the theft of which they had information. It seems to us it could not have been the design of the legislature that where there has been an occurrence of this nature arising out of a common cause, we should separate what happened into different compartments, as it were, and try the cases relating to different acts done in the course of the same occurrence separately. The evidence of the whole occurrence must be before the Court before it can come to a proper conclusion as to the nature of the offences committed by the different persons concerned in the occurrence, and that is another test to be applied in this connexion.

(1) [1910] 33 Mad. 502=5 I. C. 847.
(2) [1903] 27 Bom. 135.

We have considered the evidence carefully and there is no good reason to doubt that the case for the prosecution is true in all its substantial features. The Sub. Inspector of Police went to the villages to make investigation, and apart from the question of law as to whether he was entitled to conduct a search in those villages which are situated within the jurisdiction of another police station, there is no reason to doubt the bona fides of his action. The Goundans however did not want that any of their houses should be searched and took the law into their own hands. They not only obstructed the police in conducting the search, but beat them causing serious injuries. There can be no question of any right of private defence in a case of this character, as it could hardly be contended that the Sub-Inspector of Police was not acting in good faith in trying to search the houses where the stolen property was suspected to be concealed. [Their Lordships discussed the evidence as against accused 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 17, 21 and 23 and affirmed the conviction against all, but accused 1 and 21, who were acquitted.] As regards the rest of the appellants, they have been convicted among other offences of an offence under S. 333, I. P. C., that is, causing hurt to a public servant in the lawful discharge of his duty. We have been asked to consider whether P. W. 1 was lawfully discharging his duty as a public servant in making or attempting to make a search of houses at Molakalipalayam and Valayapalayam.

We have no doubt that the view of the law taken on this point by the Sessions Judge is wrong. Both these villages, as already stated, lie outside the police station of Annur, and the Sub-Inspector could not make any search in the villages of Molakalipalayam and Valayapalayam unless his action could be justified under Ss. 165, Cl. 4, and 166, Criminal P. C. Under S. 166 an officer in charge of a police station may, if he wishes, require an officer in charge of the station where the place sought to be searched is situated to cause a search to be made in that place and with his help he himself can make the search. S. 165, sub-Cl. 4, on which the learned pleader appearing for the Public Prosecutor relies, says that the provisions of the Code as to search warrants shall apply, as far as may be, to a search made under this section. The argument is that the section, by implication, authorizes police officers to make searches in a place outside their own jurisdiction in the same way as a Magistrate can issue a search warrant to search a place outside the limits of his jurisdiction.

But sub-Cl. 4, S. 165 requires that the search must be made under the provisions of that very section and that section only provides for search within the limits of the police station of which the officer is in charge. This is a conclusive answer to the argument on behalf of the Crown. Further, we do not think that the legislature ever intended to confer on police officers in charge of a police station the power to make investigation outside the limits of their stations except in the mode provided by S. 166. Even where a Magistrate under Ss. 96 to 99 issues a search warrant for a place which is not within the local limits of his jurisdiction, the law requires that the warrant should be endorsed by the Magistrate who has jurisdiction over it or, in emergent cases, by the officer in charge of the police station within whose limits the place is. What sub-S. 4, S. 165 provides is that such of the provisions of the Code as lay down the mode in which a search is to be conducted, such as Ss. 102 and 103, should apply to searches by police officers; and it could not have been the intention of the legislature that any police officer in charge of a police station can, of his own will, search any place in the Presidency he chooses. We have not been referred to any sort of authority which would support the proposition put forward on behalf of the Crown, nor has the learned pleader appearing for the Public Prosecutor been able to refer to any rule in the Police Code which provides for a police officer searching houses in a place outside the limits of his own station. On the other hand, there is a ruling of the Allahabad High Court reported as Madho Sonar v. Emperor (3), which seems to us to be exactly in point and in favour of the view of the law which we have suggested. We therefore think that the convictions of all the appellants under S. 333, I. P. C., must be set aside.

We also find that several of the appellants have been convicted, in addition to an offence under S. 147, I. P. C., of offences under Ss. 323 and 325 read with S. 149, that is to say, they have been found constructively guilty of hurt, having been members of an unlawful assembly in course of which hurt was committed. Now, it has been well settled that where the object of an unlawful assembly is to cause hurt, then a member of that unlawful assembly, if he is convicted under S. 147, cannot be convicted also under S. 323 or S. 325 read with S. 149, except that such of the accused as are proved themselves to have caused hurt in the riot, would be rightly convicted of the offence of hurt in addition to the offence of rioting. In the result accused 2 will be convicted only of an offence under S. 147 and his convictions under Ss. 325 and 333 read with S. 149 will be set aside. Accused 3 is rightly convicted under Ss. 147 and 323, but his convictions under other sections will be set aside. Accused 4 will be convicted only under S. 147, and his conviction under other sections will be reversed. Accused 5 will be convicted under Ss. 147 and 323, bnt not under the other sections under which the Sessions Judge has convicted him. Accused 6 also will be convicted under Ss. 147 and 323, and his convictions under other sections will be set aside. The same applies to accused 7. We convict accused 8 under S. 147 only and set aside his convictions under the other sections. Accused 17 has been rightly convicted under Ss. 147 and 323, but his convictions under other sections will be reversed. The conviction of accused 23 under S. 147 will be upheld. His conviction under Ss. 323 and 325 read with S. 149 will be reversed.

As regards the sentences, the offence was of a serious nature and the Sessions Judge has rightly awarded severe sentences. But as we have set aside convictions under some of the sections of which the Sessions Judge wrongly found the accused persons guilty, we reduce the sentences in the case of accused 2, 4 and 23 to one year and nine months' rigorous imprisonment each and in the case of accused 3, 5, 6, 7 and 17 to two years and nine months' rigorous imprisonment each. In the case of accused 8, having regard to his old age we think simple imprisonment for one and a half years will sufficiently meet the ends of justice.

Having had all the evidence before us, we feel bound to consider the case of accused 20 who has been convicted under S. 224, I. P. C., although he has preferred no appeal to us. He was the person in whose honse a cloth alleged to be stolen property was found at Molakalipalayam and he was arrested and kept in the custody of two police constables while the Sub-Inspector went on to Valayapalayam. After the riot at Valayapalayam, when the Sub Inspector took shelter in Muthugoundanputhur, some of the mob at Molakalipalayam rescued accused 20. Accused 20 went away with the mob as the two policemen who were in charge of him had to flee on being attacked by the mob. We think he was technically guilty of the offence under S. 224, that is, of escaping from lawful custody. But having regard to the facts of the case we cannot regard his act in a serious light as in the case of the other accused. He has already suffered imprisonment for more than three months, and that will be sufficient punishment in his case. We reduce his sentence to the term already suffered and he will be discharged from custody. The order regarding security bonds will be set aside in the case of accused 1, 21 and 20 and will stand in the case of the other accused. The bail bonds of accuseds 1 and 21 will be cancelled.

P. C. Muthu Chettiar—Opposite Party.

Civil Revn. Petn. Nos. 1192 and 1193 of 1917, Decided on 6th January 1919, from order of Dist. Judge, Madura, in Misc Appls. Nos. 10 and 11 of 1917.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 47—Auction-purchaser in money decree is representative of judgment-debtor.

An auction-purchaser under a money decree is the representative of the judgment-debtor within the meaning of S. 47: 44 I. C. 350, Diss. from, [P 359 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, R. 2—Person possessing right to property can apply to enter satisfaction of decree affecting property—Order disallowing petition is revisable under Civil P. C, S. 115.

A person who possesses a right to a property is within his rights in applying under O. 21, R. 2, for entering up satisfaction of a decree affecting the property which would otherwise endanger his right to it: 30 Mad. 537, Foll. [P 359 C 1]

Petitioner obtained a money decree against S, and in execution brought a certain property to sale and purchased it himself. While the application for sale was pending, a person to whom the property had been mortgaged obtained a decree against the judgment-debtor. Petitioner paid the mortgage decree amount and prayed that the satisfaction be entered. The Court refused the prayer holding that petitioner had no locus standi to apply under O. 21, R. 2, Civil P. C. On revision to the High Court.

Held: (1) that the petitioner had a right to apply under O 21, R. 2, as he must be regarded as the representative of the judgment-debtor; (2) that the petitioner had a right to apply to the High Court under S. 115, against the order disallowing his petition [P 358 C 2]

K. Jagannadha Aiyar—for Petitioner.

T. R. Venkatarama Sastri, S. Rangachariar and S. Vaidyanatha Iyer—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—The petitioner before me obtained a money decree against one Seemia Pillai and his co-parceners. In execution of the decree he purchased the property in dispute subject to a mortgage right created by the judgment-debtors. During the pendency of the application for sale a suit was brought by the mortgagees against the common judgment-debtors and a decree was obtained. The present petitioner thereupon paid the money due under the mortgage decree and asked that satisfaction may be entered up. His application was resisted on the ground that he not being a representative of the judgment-debtors had no locus standi to apply under O. 21, R. 2. Both the Courts below have upheld this contention and rejected the application of the petitioner. Against that order this civil revision petition has been filed.

An objection was taken in limine on the ground that if the contention of the petitioner is right, his proper course was to have preferred a civil miscellaneous appeal against the order of the District Judge and not to file a revision petition, under S. 115, Civil P. C. The petitioner was justified in complaining against the mode in which the Courts below had dealt with his application and he was justified further in coming to this Court under S. 115. Even if the contention is well founded I think this is a fit case in which, following Sridharavan Somayajipad v. Puramathan Somayajipad (1). I feel inclined to convert the civil revision petition into a civil miscellaneous appeal.

On the merits my attention has been drawn to a very recent judgment of the learned Chief Justice and Kumaraswami Sastri, J., in which it was held after reviewing the earlier decisions that an auction-purchaser under a money decree is the representative of the judgment-debtor. The decision of Sadasiva Aiyar, J., and Napier, J., in Kasthuri Aiyangar v. Arunachalam Chettiar (2) is against this view. My own inclination is to agree with the more recent judgment of the learned Chief Justice and Kumaraswami Sastri, J., having regard to the fact that, during recent years, they judicially have been in favour of an expanded application of S 47 and have been impressing upon the Courts in India the necessity of disposing of such matters under the execution chapter rather than referring the parties to a regular suit. Moreover, as was pointed out in the latest judgment, the course of decisions in this Presidency strongly favours the view that an auction-purchaser under a money decree must be regarded as the representative of the judgment-debtor.

There is also the further fact, as pointed out in Pandaranga Mudalar v. Vythilinga Reddi (3) that the present petitioner has become the owner of the property and as such in his own right is entitled to see that his rights are not jeopardized by an adverse decree against the persons from whom he acquired title. O. 21, Rr. 1 and 2, do not in themselves law down as to who ought to make an application for entering up satisfaction. As was pointed out in Panduranga Mudaliar v. Vythilinga Reddi (3), a person who has got a right to the property can well be within his rights in applying for entering up satisfaction of the decree which would otherwise endanger his right to his property. I therefore hold that the Courts below are wrong in the view they have taken that the petitioner had no locus standi to come in under O. 21, R. 2. I reverse the orders of the Courts below and direct the Court of first instance to dispose of the application on the merits. Costs will abide.

Syed Bacha Sahib and others—Plaintiffs and Defendants—Respondents.

Second Appels Nos. 1635 to 1637 of 1917, Decided on 26th April 1918, against the decree of Dist. Judge, Madura, in Appeal and Suits Nos 342, 343 and 344 of 1916

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11—Erroneous decision as to rights of parties is as much res judicata as just decree.

An erroneous decree establishing the rights of the parties is as much res judicata as a just decree. The decision as to a party's rights cannot be re-opened by showing that that right was declared wrongly by the Court owing to its own and the unsuccessful party's ignorance of a fact which, if it had been brought to its notice by the unsuccessful party, would have modified its decision. The question whether that fact is true or not may not be res judicata if the unsuccessful party relies on it in a subsequent litigation, provided he establishes that he could not be reasonably expected to have made it a ground of attack or defence (as the case may be) in the former suit. But the party's ignorance of a ground of plea during the former litigation and that ground itself, even if established, cannot be permitted to take away from the binding effect of the former decision so far as it established the then rights of the parties. If the fact referred to is sought to be proved in the sub-equent suit as to rights which should have been different, evidence as to such a fact is irrelevant as it could not affect such rights. Subsequent facts showing that the rights established by the former decree have been legally modified since can be alleged and proved in the subsequent suit. [P 360 C 2, P 361 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S 11—Co defendants—Rights and obligations inter se must be defined.

For an adjudication to have effect as res judicata between co-defendants, judgment in the suit must define the real rights and obligations of the defendants inter se. [P 362 C 2]

T. R. Ramchandra Aiyar and K. S. Ramabadra Aiyar—for Appellants.

K. V. Krishnaswami Aiyar—for Respondents.

Oldfield, J.—The dispute is between the plaintiffs in each suit, who claim their shares in 6/16ths of 1/5th of the income of a Durga, and the appellants (defendants), its manager and trustee and committee members, who allege that the 1/5th in question became payable to the Durga, when the branch of the family, to which plaintiffs belong and which had previously received it, became extinct. In Second Appeal No. 1635 of 1917 it has undoubtedly been contended throughout that this matter is res judicata in the plaintiff's favour by the decision of this Court in Second Appeal No. 1957 of 1908. There is no doubt that it was a decision as to plaintiffs right generally, not as to a particular year only; and the objection to its application has accordingly been that the manager, who represented the Durga in that litigation did not rely on certain documentary evidence, which the present manager defendant has discovered and which will entail a different conclusion. It has not been shown how this evidence, which admittedly has throughout been available in the Durga records, could not have been adduced, if ordinary diligence had been used. No adequate reason for allowing the present manager to re-open the case on its merits having been shown, the lower appellate Court's decision against him must stand.

In Second Appeals Nos. 1636 and 1637 of 1917, the decision is more difficult. Firstly plaintiffs did not plead that their claim was res judicata, and secondly it is a question whether it is so, since they were not plaintiffs, but defendants 5 and 8, in the previous litigation. No doubt then, as now the dispute was regarding the right to the share in the income available for distribution, which would have fallen to the extinct branch. But the then defendants 5 and 8, after alleging their right to participate in it with the then plaintiff, demurred to the proportion in which he proposed to divide it, the former claiming a decree for his share on his own calculation, the latter reserving his claim for a separate suit; and they eventually agreed with the plaintiff as to his and their shares and took no further part in the proceedings. They were joined apparently because plaintiff had had some dispute in a former year with them as to their respective shares, although it had been settled amicably. There was in the judgment under consideration no decision as to their right, although there was no doubt incidentally to the decision as to plaintiff's right an adjudication on the question, in which they were interested, whether the fund, of which they alleged that were entitled to a share, belonged to the Durga. The important point seems to me to be that the suits were in no sense for partition and that the then plaintiffs neither statedly nor impliedly sued on behalf of any sharer except themselves and did not sue on behalf of the then defendants 5 and 8, the distinction being that drawn in Hikmat Ali v. Wali-unnissa (1) and Assan v. Pathumma (2). As the then plaintiffs did not sue on behalf of defendants 5 and 8, the test prescribed in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (3) is not fulfilled and S. 11, Civil P. C., cannot be applied. It is no doubt the case that if the former defendants 5 and 8, had wished to enforce their rights in the previous suit, they could have been joined as plaintiffs. That however is not because they and the then plaintiffs were suing on any common cause of action, but because with reference to O. 1, R. 1, Civil P. C., a common question would have arisen, and no authority has been shown us for holding that persons entitled to join as plaintiffs on that account in the language of S. 11, Expln. 4, "ought" to do so or to join in making a common matter a ground of attack. In Surender Nath Pal Chowdhry v. Brojo Nath Pal Chowdhry (4), on facts very similar to those before us, the decision was against the plea of res judicata for reasons, which (so far as they are stated) are in no way inconsistent with the foregoing. In these circumstances I hold that in these two cases the plea of res judicata cannot be accepted and that there must be a remand.

The result is that Second Appeal No. 1635 of 1917 is dismissed with costs. In Second Appeals Nos. 1636 and 1637 of 1917, the lower Court's decisions are set aside and the suits are remanded to the District Munsif for re-admission and rehearing on their merits in the light of the foregoing. Costs to date will be costs in the cause and will be provided in the decree to be passed. Court fees will be refunded on application by appellants.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The question of the exact fraction of the emoluments which the plaintiff in Second Appeal No. 1635 of 1917 was entitled to recover from the defendants in 1910 is clearly res judicata by the High Court decision in second appeal in the former suit.

That decision as to the plaintiff's said right cannot be reopened by showing that that right was declared wrongly by the Court owing to its and the unsuccessful party's having been ignorant of a fact which, if it had been brought to its notice by the unsuccessful party, would have modified its decision. The question whether that fact is true or not may not be res judicata if the unsuccessful party relies on it in a subsequent litigation, provided he establishes that he could not be reasonably expected to have made it a ground of attack or defence (as the case may be) in the former suit: see Maclean, C.J.'s opinion in Kailash Mondul v. Baroda Sundari Dasi (5). I express no decided opinion on the point. But a party's ignorance of a ground of plea during the former litigation and that ground itself, even if established, could not be permitted to take away from the binding effect of the former decision so far as it established the then rights of the parties. If the fact referred to is sought to be proved in the subsequent suit for the purpose only of showing that the decision in the former suit as to rights should have been different, evidence as to such a fact is irrelevant as it could not affect such rights. Of course, subsequent facts showing that the rights established by the former decree have been legally modified since, can be alleged and proved in the subsequent suit. In the present case what the appellants (defendants 3 to 5), who are the committee members and the manager of the plaint Goripalayam Durga, state is that the committee members and the former manager were not aware during the former litigation that the plaintiff was not entitled to claim any portion of the 6/16ths share which belonged to an extinct family, that that 6/16ths share had been gifted away in 1881 and 1883 to the Durga itself by two petitions presented by Syed Hussain Saib (the surviving male member of that family) subject to his widow's life-interest, that the Durga had been enjoying the said 6/16th share as of right since the widow's death and that these facts were discovered in the year 1910. The appellants' contention is that though the High Court in the former litigation established the plaintiff's right to recover 23/96ths share in the third pangu of the annual income of the inam villages from the committee members and the manager (the 23/96ths including 7 and 3/8ths by 30 of the 6/16ths share) the Court's decision in the plaintiff's favour as regards the 7 and 3/8ths by 30 of the 6/16ths share was erroneous and is therefore not res judicata.

I think that an erroneous decree establishing rights is as much res judicata between the parties as a just decree and the lower Courts rightly held that the evidence offered on the defendants' side to prove that the former decision was erroneous was irrelevant. I would therefore dismiss Second Appeal No. 1635 with costs. Second Appeal Nos. 1636 and 1637 also involve a question of res judicata similar to the one involved in Second Appeal No. 1635 of 1917, but there is an important difference between the question as raised in No. 1635 and the question as raised in the other two second appeals. The facts are very complicated. Some of them have however to be set out in order to understand the question of law involved. In a former suit (Original Suit No. 571 of 1905) brought by the plaintiff in Second Appeal No. 1635 of 1917 for his share in the emoluments of the Durga under the management of the contesting defendants, he made the plaintiffs in Second Appeals Nos. 1636 and 1637 defendants 5 and 8 as they also had shares in the income of the Durga. The finding in that case was that the plaintiff and defendants 5 and 8 of that suit (who are the three plaintiffs respectively in the three suits out of which the connected Second Appeals Nos. 1636 and 1637 of 1917 have arisen) were entitled to 23/96, 23/96 and 9/32 respectively of 1/5 share of the income of the whole Durga inam lands. Decree however was passed in that suit only for the then plaintiff's 23/96ths share of the income for certain faslis. No decree was passed in favour of defendants 5 and 8 in that suit against the manager and committee members of the Durga, the contesting defendants. The short question is, whether, when defendants 5 and 8 bring their own suits as plaintiffs (as they have done now in the suits out of which the Second Appeals Nos. 1636 and 1637 of 1917 have arisen), the finding in their favour in the former suit is res judicata against the manager and committee members of the Durga or whether the latter are entitled to contend and prove that the shares of these plaintiffs are not 23/96ths and 9/32nd as claimed by them but some lesser fractions.

So far as Second Appeal No. 1635 was concerned, I had little hesitation in holding in the previous portion of this judgment that as the plaintiff got a decree in the former suit against the contesting defendants on the establishment of his right to 23/96ths share in the former suit, the contesting defendants cannot be allowed to allege and prove in the second suit brought by that same plaintiff that he was entitled to a lesser share in the income. But the difficulty in these two other connected suits is that the plaintiffs in these two suits were co-defendants with the contesting defendants in the former suit. It is no doubt true that the ground on which the contesting defendants contend that these plaintiffs are entitled to get lesser shares now than the 23/96th and 9/32nd claimed by them is the same ground on which they (defendants) sought to show that the plaintiff in the former suit ought not to have been given in that suit a 23/96ths shares, but ought to have been given a lesser share. To put it in another way, the plaintiff in the former suit of 1905 got a decree for 23/96ths share because it was decided that he was entitled, in addition to what may be called his legitimate and admitted share to 7 and 3/8ths by 30 of the 6/16ths share of one Syed Husain Sahib, defendants 5 and 8 of that suit of 1905 (the plaintiffs of two of the three present suits) being also entitled as co-heirs with plaintiffs of the former suit to their due shares under the Mahomedan law in that 6/16ths share. It was necessary to find in the former suit what fraction of the 6/16th share of Syed Hussain Sahib the plaintiff in that suit was entitled to in order to give him the appropriate relief. In arriving at that finding one of the previous steps in the course of reasoning pursued by the Court was that the plaintiff and defendants 5 and 8 of that suit were cosharers in the inheritance left by Syed Hussain Sahib and inherited certain fractions of the inheritance. Does the common and connected conclusion in favour of the plaintiff and defendants 5 and 8 in that previous step of reasoning which led to the directly relevant conclusion as to the share of the plaintiffs alone in the former suit become res judicata in favour of defendants 5 and 8 also in the new suits brought by these defendants as plaintiffs?

I have found the question rather difficult to answer. In the leading case Ramchandra Narayan v. Narayan Mahadev (6), West, J., said:

"There must be a conflict of interests amongst the defendants and a judgment defining the real rights and obligation of the defendants inter so. Without necessity a judgment will not be res judicata amongst defendants."

In the former suit defendants 5 and 8 did not pray to the Court that any decree should be passed in their favour also against the contesting defendants and it was therefore not necessary to decide the rights of defendants 5 and 8 as against the contesting defendants, though it must be admitted that in deciding the rights of the plaintiffs as against the contesting defendants, it was necessary to find that the plaintiffs and defendants 5 and 8 owned in common a certain right as against the contesting defendants, of which common right the plaintiff's fraction was so much and the fractions of defendants 5 and 8 were so much respectively. In Muhammad Kuni Rowthan v. Visvanathaiyar (7) it was held that where the matter was not in issue in the former suit as between the defendants themselves but only between plaintiff and the respective defendants, the finding in the former suit as to the validity of certain mortgages in favour of one of the defendants in the former suit as against the plaintiff of that suit was not res judicata as against another defendant in the former suit when the latter brought his own suit to declare the said mortgages invalid. An analogus question was considered by Mookerjee, J., at pp. 213 and 214 of (I. L. R. 36 Cal.) of Gurdeo Singh v. Chandrika Singh (8), and that learned Judge also says that

"for an adjudication to have effect as res judicata between co-defendants, the judgment in the suit must define the real rights and obligations of the defendants inter se."

In Balambhat v. Narayanbhat (9) it was held that where one of the co-defendants was not a necessary party, the finding in the former suit as to his rights was not res judicata as against a co-defendant. But none of these decisions lays down a principle which gives a clear and direct lead to my mind in respect of the particular question arising on the facts of these two second appeals. In Chandu v. Kunhamed (10) it was expressly decided that, where one sharer, who sued under the Mahomedan law for his share making all the other cosharers party defendants, had succeeded in the first suit in obtaining a decree for his share of a certain property against a contesting defendant who denied that that particular property was divisible among the cosharers, a purchaser from an ex parte defendant in the former suit, who afterwards brought a suit for another share, could claim as against the same contesting defendant that the decision in the former suit as to the divisibility of that property was res judicata in favor of the plaintiff in the second suit also, the learned Judges relying upon Expln. 5, old Civil P. C., S. 3, (corresponding to Expln. 6, S. 11 of the present Code) in support of their decision. I confess that the inclination of my mind is also in favour of the view held in Chandu v. Kunhamed (10). But I find that in Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (3) a Full Bench overruled the decision in Chandu v. Kunhamed (10) and it is interesting that Mr. Sankaran Nair, who as appellant's vakil succeeded in persuading the Court to the contrary view in Chandu v. Kunhamed (10), was one of the Judges of the Full Bench who decided Somasundara Mudali v. Kulandaivelu Pillai (3).

In the result I hold that the question as to the shares of the plaintiffs in Second Appeals Nos. 1636 and 1637 is not res judicata by the decision in the suit of 1905. I would therefore set aside the decisions of the lower Courts and remand the case to the Court of first instance for disposal according to law. Costs hitherto to abide. Court fees on second appeal memo to be refunded to appellants.

Second Appeal No. 1838 of 1917, Decided on 24th October 1918, against decree of Temporary Sub-Judge., Ellore, in Appeal Suit No. 106 of 1916.

(a) Limitation Act (9 of 1908), Art. 125—Suit for declaration by reversioners next and remote—There is only one cause of action for all—Failure to bring suit within period fixed by Art. 125—Suit is barred against all.

There is only one cause of action for a declaratory suit for all reversioners, next and remote, and when that cause of action once becomes barred under Art. 125 by the failure to bring a suit by any of the reversioners within the period fixed by that article, no reversioner, whether in existence or not at the date of the alienation, can afterwards bring such a suit. [P 364 C 2]

(b) Hindu Law — Alienation — Widow—Compromise of litigation by widow does not amount to alienation.

The compromise of a litigation entered into by a female owner, with right over property, her title to which is disputed by the opposite party, the compromise recognizing the disputant's title to the property, does not amount to an alienation of the property in the disputant's favour by her, and the disputant does not hold the property thereafter under any new title derived from, or created by her. [P 365 C 1]

 (c) Limitation Act (9 of 1908), Art. 125—Alienation by Hindu widow — Suit to set aside alienation by daughter compromised—Compromise does not amount to fresh alienation-Fresh cause of action does not accrue.

The daughter of a Hindu widow brought a suit to set aside an alienation by her mother and the suit was compromised. Subsequently, the reversioners brought a suit impeaching the same alienation.

Held: that the period of limitation for such a suit was that prescribed by Art. 125, Sch. 1, Lim. Act, and that as the compromise by the daughter did not amount to a fresh alienation, no fresh cause of action accrued to the reversioners. [P 365 C 2, P 366 C 1]

P. Narayanamuthy—for Respondents.

Sadasiva Aiyar, J—The plaintiffs are the appellants. They and defendant 6 are the sons of defendant 7 who is the daughter of one Soma Raju, who died about 30 years ago leaving a widow Venkayya as his heir with the limited powers of a Hindu female heir. She died in 1901, having alienated the plaint properties in 1893 to one Chandra Raju, whose widow is defendant 1 under whom defendants 2 to 5 claim. The plaintiffs' mother (defendant 7), as the next reversionary heir, brought a suit in 1901 very soon after her mother's death to set aside the alienation by her mother in favour of Chandra Raju. She however compromised that suit by the compromise agreement set out in the decree, Ex. 1, dated August 1902. Under that compromise, Chandra Raju was to enjoy the alienated lands as of right (and there were other terms not necessary to be mentioned in detail), defendant 7 receiving Rs. 165 5-0 to compensate her for the costs of the suit and for giving up her claim to the possession of the lands.

This decree, as I said before, was in 1902, when one of defendant 7's sons (defendant 6) was about 20 years old, his younger brothers, the plaintiffs, being then minors. The present suit was brought in 1912 for two reliefs: (1) that the plaintiffs' maternal grandmother's (Venkayya's) alienation of the plaint properties to Chandra Raju in 1893 might be declared invalid against the plaintiffs' and defendant 6's reversionary rights; (2) that the plaintiffs' mother's (defendant 7's) alienation by the compromise, Ex. 1, of 1902 of the plaint propreties might also be declared not binding upon the plaintiffs and defendant 6.

The lower Courts dismissed the plaintiffs' suit, the lower appellate Court basing its decision solely on the point of limitation, which it decided against the plaintiffs on the ground that defendant 6 could and ought to have brought a suit of this nature on behalf of himself and the plaintiffs within 6 years from August 1902, when his mother (defendant 7) entered into the compromise, Ex. 1. He relied upon the decision in Krishnier v. Lakshmiammal (1) in support of this opinion. The learned Subordinate Judge's reference to 6 years as the period of limitation is probably based upon the dictum in Narayana Aiyar v. Rama Aiyar (2), where it was held that Art. 125 providing a limitation period of twelve years did not apply to a suit brought by a remoter presumptive reversioner after the death of the alienating female, his right to bring such a suit being based on the circumstance that the collusion or negligence of the next living female reversionary heir with limited interest had precluded the latter from bringing the suit. It was further held in that case that Art. 120 applied to such a suit and that the period of 6 years provided for in that article was to be calculated from when the next female reversioner precluded herself by her laches or conduct from herself bringing such a suit at the time when the remoter reversioner brought it.

But the view above propounded in Narayana Aiyar v. Rama Aiyar (2), following Krishnier v. Lakshmiammal (1), proceeds on the footing that each successive reversioner or set of reversioners has got a separate cause of action which arises when the preceding reversioner (or set of reversioners standing in the same degree) has (or have) lost his (or their) rights by laches or conduct to bring the suit. This view however, which was held until 1917; see Venkata Row v. Tuljaram Row (3) has now been overruled by the decision of the Full Bench of five Judges reported in Challagundla Varamma v. Madala Gopaladasayya (4). That Full Bench decision held that there is only one cause of action for a declaratory suit for all reversioners, next and remote, and that when that cause of action once becomes barred under Art. 125 by the failure to bring a suit by any of the reversioners within the period fixed by Art. 125, no reversioner (whether in existence or not at the date of the alienation) can afterwards bring such a suit. The Subordinate Judge should therefore have relied upon Art. 125, and not Art. 120 on the question of limitation, so far as the relief related to the declaration of the invalidity of the plaintiff's grandmother's alienation.

It is however argued by the learned vakil who appeared for the appellants that it is only the alienation by the plaintiffs' grandmother Venkayya in 1893 that could not be questioned by the plaintiffs because it was barred by limitation, but that they could question the alienation made by the plaintiffs' mother, defendant 7, through the compromise Ex. 1, that alienation being a new alienation of 1902 (though by way of confirmation of the alienation of 1893 made by plaintiffs' grandmother), and that they have got 12 years from the date of this fresh alienation, i. e., from 1902 to bring a suit to declare that alienation invalid as against the plaintiffs and defendant 6.

The question thus raised is rather a difficult one to decide. The appellants' vakil relied on the case reported in Akkineri Sreeramulu v. Mullapudi Ramayya (5) as in his favour. There the widow made the alienation in 1874. The daughters sued in 1892 to set aside that alienation, evidently during the widow's lifetime. They then withdrew that suit "on the ground that the alienation was valid." Their sons then brought the suit decided as Akkineri Sreeramulu v. Mullapudi Ramayya (5) in the year 1893 to declare that both the alienation of 1874 and what they called "the alienation made by way of confirmation," by their mothers (defendants 3 and 4 in the suit) in 1892 through their withdrawal of the suit of 1892 were not binding on the plaintiffs. The learned Judges (Bhashyam Aiyangar and Moore, JJ.) held that so far as the claim related to the relief of a declaration that the widow's alienation of 1874 was bad, the suit was barred, but that, in respect of the claim based on the withdrawal by the plaintiffs' mothers (defendants 3 and 4) of the suit of 1892 the suit brought in 1893 was not barred. The judgment of the learned Judges is (if I may say so with respect) rather too brief and hence, naturally there is some obscurity as to the precise propositions of law laid down therein. The judgment does not definitely state that the withdrawal of the plaintiffs' mother's suit is, in the eye of the law, a new alienation made by the plaintiffs' mother, as alleged by the plaintiffs. It merely recites the prayer in the plaint which treats such withdrawal as a substantive new alienation. At the end of the judgment, such withdrawal is referred to as "a confirmation of the alienation of 1874," and it is stated that such "confirmation gives a fresh cause of action" and hence the claim for the relief based on that cause of action was not barred.

As the suit was brought in 1893 (the next year after the so-called "confirmation"), the suit was rightly held not to be barred, but the learned Judges do not state what article of the Limitation Act applied to the claim for such relief. If the learned Judges really intended to lay down that the withdrawal of a declaratory suit brought by presumptive reversioners is, in the eye of the law, a substantive alienation by them of the properties already alienated by the widow, I dissent with great respect. In Timmaji Amma Garu v. Subbaraju (6), Miller and Munro, JJ., held that the compromise of a litigation enterel into by a female owner with limited rights in respect of a property, her title to which was disputed by the opposite party, the compromise recognizing the disputant's title to the property, did not amount to an alienation of the property in the disputant's favour by her and that the disputant did not hold the property thereafter under any new title derived from or created by her. Of course, such a compromise might be attacked in a proper suit brought by a person interested on the ground that it was fraudulent or collusive, but such a suit would not be a suit to set aside the alienation by a female owner with limited rights, to which Art. 125 would apply. The correctness of the decision in Akkineri Sreeramulu v. Mullapudi Ramayya (5) can of course be upheld, if it merely decided that the claim held in that decision not to be barred by limitation was a claim merely for declaring void as against the plaintiffs (by reason of fraud or collusion) the withdrawal of the previous suit brought by the plaintiff's mother in that case. In Narayana Aiyar v. Rama Aiyar (2) the opinion was expressed that the article of the Limitation Act applicable to such a suit by a reversioner who is not the next reversioner was six years under Art. 120, the term to be calculated from when the plaintiff's right accrued. In Khunni Lal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (7) their Lordships of the Privy Council state that a compromise which recognizes the title of the disputant does not confer a new distinct title on the disputant, but is merely an acknowledgment of and a definition of the disputant's title and does not therefore amount to a new alienation in favour of the disputant. The appellants' learned vakil however sought to distinguish these decisions on the ground that the terms of the compromise Ex. 1 in the present case indicated an abandonment by Chandra Raju of his title under the alienation of 1893 (made by the plaintiffs' grandmother) and the obtaining of a fresh title under a fresh alienation of 1902 (made by the plaintiffs' mother, defendant 7). After anxious consideration of the terms of Ex. 1, I have come to the conclusion that this contention cannot prevail. I can find no expression in Ex. 1 indicating that Chandra Raju relinquished his title obtained under the alienation of 1893 (which, according to his contention in that suit, was binding on the reversioners), nor anything to show that he acknowledged that the plaintiffs' mother was then entitled to make a fresh alienation ignoring the plaintiffs' grandmother's alienation or to give him fresh title in supersession of the title which he claimed to have obtained under the alienation of 1893.

The mere fact that he paid some money to obtain the acknowledgment by the plaintiffs' mother (defendant 7) of the validity of his title to the plaint lands and house created under the document of 1893 does not, in my opinion, amount to any such relinquishment of the title which he claimed in that suit under the document of 1893. The test to see whether the compromise itself amounted to an alienation is to find out whether the property alleged to have been alienated by the compromise was one not claimed by the disputant as held by him on an existing title created prior to the compromise, but was property to which he could have derived his title for the first time (according to the pleadings in the case or according to any admissions in the compromise itself) only under the compromise and on the date of the compromise. Several cases of the Allahabad and Patna High Courts were quoted by the appellants' learned vakil, but the decisions in most of them depended on the particular facts which were held to have shown an intention on the part of the female heir to make a first or fresh alienation through the instrumentality of a nominal compromise, a nominal arbitration or some such bogus proceeding. There are, no doubt, some cases in which language of a wider character has been employed apparently supporting the appellants' contention, but I feel myself bound by the decisions of this Court and of the Privy Council to apply the test, I have above indicated as the correct one; and, so applying that test, I am satisfied that there was no new alienation intended or effected under Ex. 1.

Even if the claim in the plaint in this suit to obtain the relief of a declaration as to the invalidity of this new alleged alienation of 1902 is amended as one to declare the compromise agreement invalid against the plaintiffs and the defendant 6 on the ground of fraud or coercion practised upon defendant 7 (see para. 7 of the plaint), the claim for such a relief is barred under the 6 years' rule. In the result the secand appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Spencer, J.— In Bangarayudu v. Perayya Sastry (8), to which decision I was a party, it was observed that, in some instances, compromises by the limited owner may amount to family settlements, while, in other cases, they cannot be placed on a higher footing than alienations, and a number of decisions were quoted to illustrate both classes of transactions No doubt it is true that there is no well-marked line of demarcation between the class of transactions which are compromises in the nature of family settlements and the class of compromises which are alienations. The recent Privy Council decision in Amrit Narayan Singh v. Gaya Singh (9) does not throw much light on the subject, as the compromise and the reference to arbitration during the widow's life in that case was made by the minor reversioner's father purporting to act on behalf of his wife and his infant son. In an earlier Privy Council case in Khunni Lal v. Gobind Krishna Narain (7) their Lordships applied the test, to a transaction challenged by reversioners as an alienation, of seeing whether the alienee derives title from the holder of the limited interest or not, and in Ranga Rao v. Ranganayaki Ammal (10) Phillips, J. on the same principle examined the facts to see whether the widow's action had, as a necessary result, the transfer of the property or whether she materially contributed by her action to the transfer, and he decided that the mere withdrawal of the defence in the suit would not amount to such an act of transfer. So in the present case, the plaintiffs' mother G. Venkayya, brought a suit to declare the alienation made by their grandmother A. Venkayya to be invalid. When the former withdrew her claim to the lands under the terms of the compromise, she did not purport to transfer any further interest in the suit property beyond what their grandmother A. Venkayya had already alienated. The decision in Akkineri Sreeramulu v. Mullapudi Ramayya (5) was strongly relied upon by the appellants' vakil as an authority for holding that a fresh cause of action would arise upon a compromise of the suit by the plaintiffs' mother G. Venkayya.

The learned Judges who decided that case did not expressly state what kind of action the withdrawal of the previous suit without leave to sue again would give rise to. If they had in contemplation a suit by the daughters' sons to set aside the decree in the former suit as having been arrived at by fraud and collusion on the part of their mothers, for which the limitation period would be 6 years under Art. 120, Lim. Act, the statement that the withdrawal of the suit of 1892 gave rise to a fresh cause of action and that the suit of 1893 was not barred by limitation is quite intelligible; and I think that this is what was intended, as I find that one of the defences to the suit was a denial that there had been any collusion. But if it was intended that the second suit in that case should be treated as one governed by Art. 125, then I should be inclined to respectfully doubt the correctness of that decision, and I would follow the decision in Timmaji Amma Garu v. Subbaraju (6) which laid down that a widow entering into a compromise with a person, who disputes her right to property, when she merely undertakes to make no further claim to the property, does not thereby alienate the property and the property is not in consequence held under any title derived from her. In the case now before us, the suit was not instituted within six years of the compromise of the earlier suit.
